By 9 & 10 Vict., c. 95, s. 128, the right of a plaintiff to sue in the superior court, without danger to his costs in case of success, on the ground that the County Court had jurisdiction in the matter, and that the proceedings should have been taken therein, is preserved in certain cases, one of which is, "where the plaintiff dwells more than twenty miles from the defendant." This section, and the particular branch of it now referred to has been discussed under every conceivable aspect. Thus, with regard to the mode of calculating the prescribed distance, it has been held that it is to be as the crow flies; that is to say, in a straight line from house to house, without reference to the actual route by which a journey from one to the other may be performed (Lake v. Butler, 3 Ell. & Bl. 92); and in a subsequent case, this rule of measurement was held (it may be incidentally remarked) to be applicable to all cases where the distance between two places is, in an Act of Parliament made the basis for some enactment (see Jewel v. Stead, 6 Ell. & Bl. 350). Again, it has been held that the meaning of the proviso is that the plaintiff has his election if the defendant's dwelling place be more than twenty miles from the place where the plaintiff dwells, although the defendant's place of business may be within that distance (Peterson v. Davis, 7 D. & L., 109). And it has been decided that where a person has a permanent "dwelling" in one place, he cannot be said also to dwell at another place where he has only temporary lodgings (Macdougall v. Paterson, 11 C. B., 755); although, on the other hand, where the plaintiff has more than one permanent dwelling—one within the twenty miles of the defendant's dwelling, and the other beyond that distance—it has been decided by the Common Pleas, (in opposition to an earlier case in the Queen's Bench), that the plaintiff is entitled to select the more distant of his residences as that in which he dwells (see Butler v. Ablewhite, 6 C. B. N. S., 1254; contra Bailey v. Bryant, 28 L. J., Q. B., 86). To these judicial interpretations we must add one that brings us to the case now under discussion, viz., that a corporation is liable to be sued in a county court (a proposition which may be thought hardly to require an express authority), and that a corporation "dwells" within the meaning of the 128th section at the place where its business is carried on (Taylor v. Crowland Gas Co., 11 Exch., 1). This last rule of construction seems to leave nothing for discussion with regard to the case of corporations generally; but the defendants in the case now under discussion happening to be a railway company, it was contended that their dwelling must be held to be in every place where their business was carried on; that is to say, at every station. This, if held correct, would have deprived the plaintiff of his costs, as he dwelt less than twenty miles from a station on the defendant's line of railway; but the Court held that the head office is the dwelling of a railway company, and that office only. This decision seems to follow the principle of Macdougall v. Paterson, 11 C. B., 755, above cited, viz., that for the purposes of this section the plaintiff cannot have more than a single "dwelling place,"—a doctrine which agrees with that persisted in by the Common Pleas in Butler v. Ablewhite, but inconsistent with that of the Queen's Bench in Bailey v. Bryant. Consequently the present case may be considered as a declaration by the Court of Exchequer, that they will adhere to the view of the former court should the question be directly raised before them for decision.

We may further remark that in a case since Butler v. Ablewhite the Court of Queen's Bench avoided either overruling or confirming their previous view in Bailey v. Bryant by deciding the case then before them on the narrower ground that the plaintiff had only one permanent dwelling, because his other residence was subservient to the purposes of his business (Kerr v. Haynes, 29 L. J., Q. B., 70). It does not appear how they would have held had the plaintiff been possessed of two residences, each of them used indifferently for the purpose of dwelling in.

FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE—HABEAS CORPUS, DIFFERENT KINDS OF—AT COMMON LAW AND UNDER STATUTE.

Ex parte Anderson, 9 W. R., Q. B., 255.

With reference to this case—now watched with such universal interest—it may not be uninteresting briefly to review the legal bearings of the writ, by virtue of which the authorities at Canada are directed to bring up Anderson before the Queen's Bench at Westminster.

The writ of habeas corpus, though usually applied to vindicate the liberty of the subject, is also used for other purposes; for there are several writs all called generally writs of habeas corpus, which have distinctive additions corresponding to their several objects; and it has been recently held that the writ cannot issue in a general form, but must be for a specified object recognized by the law (see Benns v. Morley, 2 C. B. N. S. 116). Thus the habeas corpus ad respondendum is sued out in order to remove a prisoner confined by the process of any inferior court, to charge him with a new action in one of the superior courts: though, since the abolition of arrest on meane process, and the almost complete desuetude of borough and other inferior courts, this species of the writ could scarcely occur in practice. Then there is the habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum, which is for the purpose of charging in execution a prisoner confined elsewhere than in the prison of the court out of which the process of execution issued (see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 127). And again, there is the habeas corpus ad testificandum, to remove an execution debtor confined in prison, in order to give evidence in some court of justice (see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 9; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 31). Another species of the writ is the habeas ad faciendum et respondendum (otherwise called an habeas cum causâ), which issues to remove civil proceedings from an inferior to one of the superior courts—together with the defendant therein, if in custody.

The most common and by far the most important species of the writ, however, is the famous habeas ad subjiciendum, used for the deliverance from illegal confinement. This writ may be directed to any person who detains another in custody, and commands him to produce to the Court whence the writ issues, the body of the prisoner, with the date and cause of his caption and detention. It may issue from any of the superior courts of law or from the Court of Chancery, and either in term time or vacation; and it runs into all parts of the dominions of the Crown; for, (says Blackstone), "the king is at all times entitled to have an account why the liberty of any of his subjects is restrained wherever that restraint may be inflicted."

The writ is so far a writ of right, and not to be denied to any applicant, that it is necessary only to make application for it supported by affidavits establishing to the satisfaction of the Court some probable cause which the party has to be delivered (see per Vaughan, C. J., Bushell's Case, 2 Jon. 13), and when awarded, the only return which can be made is to bring up the body of the prisoner alive.

The proceedings on this writ are partly regulated by the common law and partly by two statutes—the 31 Car. 2, c. 2, (usually called the Habeas Corpus Act), and the 56 Geo. 3, c. 100.

In neither of these Acts, however, is any mention made of the Colonies, though privileged places and the Channel Islands are expressly brought within their provisions; and it is therefore apprehended that the authority for issuing the writ to the Canadian tribunals must be exclusively sought in the doctrines of the common law, and that the statutable practice under the writ has no application.

For an issue of the writ to a colony such as Canada, there seems to be no sufficient precedent; but the course which has been taken by the Queen's Bench (while it must command the approval of the feelings of all) seems amply justified by the principles of the English law, if not supported by express authority. And, particularly, it is in strict accordance with the proposition of Blackstone above referred to, the value of whom, as an authority, is great (as remarked by Lord Denman in the Canadian Prisoners Case, 9 A. & E. p. 780), because it shows the general opinion that prevailed at the time when he wrote his commentaries.

It cannot, however, be denied, that none of the instances cited at the bar in support of the application for the writ are much in point. The case in Burrows (Re. v. Cowle, 2 Burs. 836), was an application in reference to a "certiorari," directed to the Mayor and Corporation of Berwick. Carus Wilson's case (7 Q. B., 984) decided, it is true, that the writ runs to Jersey and, probably at common law; or, in other words, that the statutes quoad hoc are declaratory merely; but then Jersey and Canada cannot be considered as both of them colonies in the same sense of the word. The same remark may be made with regard to Crawford's case (13 Q. B., 613), which shows only that the Isle-of-Man is in the same position with regard to this writ as Jersey. As for the Canadian prisoner's case (case of Watson and others, 9 Q. B., 731) that was an habeas corpus, directed to an English gaoler, who detained the prisoners at Liverpool under a warrant from the Canadian government; a very different matter from the one in hand. And, lastly, as to the recent case of Ex parte Lees (1 E. & E., 878), in which a writ of habeas corpus was applied for to be directed to the authorities at St. Helena, to bring up the body of a prisoner then undergoing three years' imprisonment, for an assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm;—in the first place, the application was refused; and, in the next place, the Court (under the presidency of Lord Campbell), made an observation very pertinent to the case now proceeding. After remarking that some old precedents of writs issued out of this court to the French dominions of our early English sovereigns (probably alluding to the case of Duke of Gloucester, imprisoned at Calais, 1389) had been cited to show that such writs might now lawfully issue, his lordship has continued: "No precedent of any such proceeding with respect to a dependency like St. Helena for several centuries was brought before us; and it was not at all explained in what manner our writs of error, certiorari, or habeas corpus, could be enforced in such dependencies." It may be hoped, however, that this difficulty will not present itself to the Canadian mind, or that it will willingly waive the solution in favorem vite.

Review.

Commentaries on the Common Law; designed as introductory to its study. By HERBERT BROOM, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Second edition. London. 1861.

The appearance of a second edition of Mr. Broom's Commentaries on the Common Law is a phenomenon which deserves some examination and remark. Mr. Broom holds the office of reader in common law to the inns of court, and the Commentaries being used as a text-book in the course of study established by the Council of Legal Education, give us some insight into the character of the preparation for the bar designed by that body. The institution of the readerships by the inns of court about ten years ago, resulted from the conviction that the inns of court were not adequately fulfilling their duties towards the public and their students in preparing the latter for the bar; and, in respect to the mode of preparation then in vogue, that it was too purely practical and technical, being deficient in the higher and more philosophical branches of law. A third motive may have influenced many in supposing that the expensive mode of preparation by a private course of practice in the actual business of law in a pleader's, or in a conveyancer's, or solicitor's chambers, might be wholly or in a great measure superseded by a system of public lectures and examinations. The design of supplying a philosophical and theoretical knowledge of law is partly carried out by the lectures on the science and history of jurisprudence and on the civil law, which certainly offer what could not previously be obtained; while the more practical knowledge which it was supposed the Council of Legal Education could adequately supply, may be fairly represented in this matter of common law, by the work of the reader on that subject, now before us. We proceed, therefore, to examine it rather with the view of judging how far it combines scientific exposition with practical information, and is generally calculated to effect the object for which we presume it was intended, of conveying a sound and enlightened knowledge of law to a class of students from whom the profession in the highest branches of its practice and in its highest offices is supplied.

The title "Commentaries on the Common Law," though certainly not too large for the purpose thus designed, must, we find in the performance, be accepted with great reservation, or rather with an exception of nearly everything which would be generally expected under that title. The book, in fact, treats only of the constitution, jurisdiction, and procedure of the common law courts, and of the actions and remedies enforceable therein; comprising besides, if not within, this description of the contents, chapters on contracts, on torts, and on the criminal law. The method of the work seems to be to avoid any approach to scientific or theoretical exposition, and to expound didactically the precise rules of the law throughout the scope of its province, with merely so much of coherence as is sufficient to link them together in some sort of association or sequence. "Municipal law," we are told at the outset, "comprises the rules which have been laid down for the guidance of the community, to which its members must, if they would avoid penal consequences, necessarily conform." We proceed to read the rules which we are to obey. The reconciliation on moral or constitutional grounds of our obedience with our conceptions of liberty and reason we suppose is left to the jurisprudential department of legal education. The only account of common law we find is that "it is composed of two elements or materials, the lex scripta, and the lex non scripta. The lex scripta comprises the statute law of the land." Having studied English law with the assistance of Blackstone and Lord Coke, we have hitherto held, and shall still continue to hold, the old fashioned notion that common law and statute law represent essentially different conceptions; but those who study law under Mr. Broom seem likely to hold new views on this and on many other points.

However, we are not detained beyond the perusal of the above two passages in the regions of definition and principles, but plunge at once into the more safe and congenial wilderness of specific statute, and case law. The bulk of the work, which runs to about one thousand pages, is made up of citations of cases and verbatim excerpts from judgments and statutes, in the well-known patchwork style so familiar to English law writers, and in which the compiler of the "selection of legal maxims," and the "Practice of the County Courts," has had some experience. It alternates from the broadest generalities to the most hair-splitting differences, according to the mere haphazard course of decisions, without any regard for a complete and even treatment. We do not wish to disparage this style of writing when applied to its proper object; still less would we underrate the reading and research which it betokens. In a work intended strictly for professional purposes, it is justifiable and indispensable; the most condensed and accurate notes of the law being there required, editorial remark or comment is a work of supererogation, and the substantial interest which impels the reader in his search for the latest decisions, overcomes any repugnance to the literary style. But in a work intended for students, who are beginners only in law, and who are possibly conversant with the highest ranges and literature of physical and moral science, some more philosophical and methodical, or at least logical, method of treatment might be expected, and would surely be acceptable. It may be thought expedient by the Council of Legal Education to attempt instruction in the most minute and technical subtleties of the law, and to send forth their students ready armed for the actual warfare of their profession; but would it not be better, in such case, at once to familiarize them with the well-established and trustworthy text-books? Why should new and special works be presented to them, unless some new and appropriate system is to be adopted for their education? Mr. Broom excuses the omission of the law of landlord and tenant from his work on account of the existence of an excellent work on the subject by Mr. Smith. A like reason would dispense with his treating at all of an action at law, of the law of contracts, or of mercantile law; for on all these subjects Mr. Smith has left equally excellent and accurate treatises.

The commentaries, after the preliminary statements of the elements of the common law to which we have already alluded, enters upon an historical sketch of the courts of common law, and explains briefly their procedure and jurisdiction. Rights of action and their remedies are then treated of. Mr. Broom here discourses at great length on the old verbal quibbles of damnum absque injuria, and injuria sine damno, as the test of determining a valid right of action. Damnum he defines as "damage capable in legal contemplation of being estimated by the jury." But this definition begs the whole question; for all instances cited of damnum not actionable consist of damage not legally capable of being estimated by the jury. Again, he lays down the position that injuria sine damno may be actionable; which is an unusual way of putting it, if not a wrong one. He maintains this position by excluding "nominal damages" from damnum, at a sacrifice of his definition of that word above given; since nominal damages are capable in legal contemplation of being estimated by the jury, and, what is more, must in law be assessed by them. Here again we prefer adhering to the usual phraseology to following Mr. Broom. "Nominal damages," according to the late Mr. Justice Maule, "mean a sum of money that may be spoken of, but that has no existence in point of quantity." And as "a peg to hang costs upon," their distinctive character is of material importance. The truth is, such a scholastic analysis of a right of action into injuria and damnum is quite unsubstantial, and never assisted anyone in advising upon a case. All injuries or infringements of a right are actionable; some injuries infringe the right directly, and are proved by the injurious act itself; others are proved by the injury or infringement consequent upon the act, which would not otherwise be injurious. This is the only distinction in substance; and the real difficulty represented by the pedantry respecting damnum sine injuria is in tracing the connection between the act and its consequences. Is there a link of cause and effect which the law will recognise?

Mr. Broom finds no difficulty in the concise division of causes of action into those ex contractu and those ex delicto, translating the latter term by the phrase "independent of contract." Two lines are sufficient for him to set forth this extensive and primary classification. Philosophically speaking, however, it may be much doubted whether any such precise distinction can be drawn, and practically speaking, whether there is any value in it. At any rate the line of demarcation is very dubious and uncertain. An unsophisticated student might be inclined to ask whether a breach of contract is not a delictum or tort, and what is the essential difference between the obligation to compensation for damages arising from a tort of this nature and any other tort; also whether an action for money received to the use of the plaintiff, where paid in mistake, or obtained tortiously or by fraud, is not independent of contract, and how it comes to be classed among transactions which distinctively depend upon consent. To questions of this nature Mr. Broom's work affords no satisfaction; yet they are of a kind which the student must necessarily encounter, and, if a faithful student, cannot conscientiously pass over. Mr. Broom's philosophy does not extend beyond the limits of statutes and judicial decisions, and so far is legally safe; but questions of this nature are wholly beyond the province of the tribunals, however philosophically their judgments may be framed. The dictum of a judge may be the ne plus ultra of wisdom; but there are some topics which he cannot discourse upon. Courts of justice lay down principles in the form of maxims and positive rules, in order thereon to found their judgment in the case before them; they cannot proceed to discuss the connection of principles and their coherence in scientific form. This is beyond their province, because it can have no application to the matter in judgment. Mr. Broom is content to record the practical principles established by the courts. To construct the pure science of principles from these materials is the province of the student of science—a province which he ignores.

Passing on to the chapter on Torts, will any person, except the most thoughtless student, be satisfied with the following parliamentary definition:—"A tort is described in statutory language as 'a wrong independent of contract.' It involves the idea, if not of some infraction of law, at all events of some infringement or withholding of a legal right, or some violation of a legal duty." Yet this is all the general foundation he will find here laid for deducing and comprehending the detailed doctrines on the subject. Mr. Broom proceeds to classify torts as—1. The invasion of some legal right. 2. The violation of a public duty productive of damage to the plaintiff. 3. The infraction of some private duty, likewise productive of damage to the plaintiff. Such classification is founded on merely empirical grounds, which are quite valueless; for if the violation of a right is established, it is quite immaterial what is the character of the wrongful act which has occasioned it. Moreover, the classification is unsound, for the latter class consists chiefly, if not exclusively, of obligations arising out of contract, and perhaps is wide enough to include all contracts; and a breach of contract is actionable without actual damage, or, according to Mr. Broom, is an actionable injuria sine damno. Under the head of torts we find bailment and all its varieties treated of. We had always supposed with Blackstone, and other great lawyers who have treated of bailments, that transactions of this kind were matters of contract; and, indeed, here we have the authority of the recent case of Legge v. Tucker (1 H. & N. 500), to show that an action on a bailment is substantially founded on contract, even though the declaration is framed in tort upon the duty imposed by the contract. As a recent decision holds that an action for breach of the common law duty of a carrier is not an action of contract (Tattan v. Great Western Railway Company, 29 L. J., Q. B., 184), we may find some ground for Mr. Broom treating the law of carriers under this head; but as carriers are at liberty to make any reasonable contracts, and generally avail themselves of this mode of avoiding their common law duties, and as most questions relating to carriers now arise upon the contracts thus made, it seems to us that this subject also would more appropriately follow the common usage, and be treated as a contract. Mr. Broom is certainly the first writer who has treated ejectment as a mere action of tort, amongst which he classes it, notwithstanding the effect of it is only upon the land, and imposes no obligation on the defendant, and notwithstanding it is exceptional to most of the general rules relating to actions and procedure which he has previously expounded. The old fiction of entry and ouster, which would have given him some colour for so doing, was abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, and as he has omitted all mention of real property in his commentaries on common law, we think he might more appropriately have omitted ejectment also, instead of assigning to it this unusual position.

It is impossible in our present limits to criticise this work in detail, and in the few observations above made, we have chosen rather to judge it according to its pretensions than on the footing of an ordinary text book, to which, however, it more nearly resembles in style. The statements of the rules of law and of the decisions seem on the whole to be accurate and clear, notwithstanding an unfortunate tendency, not unfrequent in lawyers, to disguise common sense by an artificial and technical mode of exposition. The authorities cited in the foot-notes are extremely copious, and we have no reason to doubt they are very complete.

The account given in the preface of the nature and object of this work is so peculiar, that the writer must be allowed to state it in his own language:—

"This work has been written with a view to filling what has long appeared to me a void in legal literature, its aim being to present explanatory comments on the law, illustrated by cases, selected in sufficient number and with sufficient care, to enable the reader to pursue for himself in detail the matters debated or touched upon in the text. In the choice of topics for discussion, I have been guided in part by an examination of standard treatises, but yet more materially by an experience of three years, devoted almost exclusively to the delivery of lectures upon the leading branches and departments of our common law. Whilst thus engaged in tracing out its principles, and indicating its practice, my attention has been perpetually directed to points of difficulty or interest, imperatively needing elucidation, which had previously escaped my notice; on all such points which, as they presented themselves, were from time to time scrupulously noted down, I have in the ensuing pages attempted more or less fully to throw light."

It seems superfluous to remark that a person capable of taking a large and scientific review of law, would not unexpectedly run his head against points of difficulty and interest in the blindfold manner described; but would be familiar with their exact whereabouts and position, and with all their limiting conditions and circumstances. The account of the choice of topics here given we can well believe, for it seems to have been guided chiefly by the mere arbitrary and unfettered discretion, which a lecturer, in dealing with students, is at liberty to exercise. As to the want of explanatory comments on the law illustrated by sufficiently numerous or carefully selected cases, whether the alleged want be positive or comparative, we beg totally to differ from him. Are there no works on procedure, practice, contracts, torts, and criminal law, more full and trustworthy than Mr. Broom's scanty chapters? What we do indeed want are works which shall present the law to students with accuracy, and, at the same time, upon broad scientific principles which shall recommend themselves to their reason and common sense, leaving the details of law to be elaborated in practice. Commentaries on English law worthy of the nineteenth century have not yet been written. Mr. Broom attempts no more than an indoctrination of his disciples with the plain letter of the law. It is true that he arrogates a scientific character to his work; but, in common with a large class of law writers, wholly misconceives the true nature of science. "If it be true," he writes, "that law is really worthy to be called a science; if it be true that lex est ratio mensque sapientis ad iudicandum et ad deterrendum idonea; if further, we are justified in affirming that potius ignorantia juris litigiosa quam scientia; is it, indeed, vain or inexpedient to hope that a sound knowledge of legal principles may gradually be desiderated by, and spread amongst, the educated classes of this country? Is it futile or unwise to predicate that much and enduring good would thence result? As regards myself, whose main incentive to the preparation of these commentaries has been a desire to facilitate the attainment of such end, the consciousness of having done so—in any the slightest degree—would amply compensate for past labours." In the preface to the present edition, he adds his "earnest hope that these commentaries may aid in the progress of legal education, and the advancement of legal science." From these passages we infer that the writer's conception of legal science is as the mere voice of despotic authority commanding and terrifying its subjects, or as the familiar acquaintance with the rules of law, which serves a man to guide his affairs with safety and without litigation.

Juridical Society.

ON SOME ERRORS IN LEGISLATION ILLUSTRATED BY THE STATUTES RELATING TO JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

A paper on this subject was lately read at a meeting of the Juridical Society, by Mr. NATHANIEL LINDLEY, one of the secretaries of the Society. It was as follows:—

A long study of the law relating to companies has convinced me that its unsatisfactory state, both past and present, is to a great extent attributable to a disregard by the Legislature of a few important principles established by writers on jurisprudence and legislation; and it will be my endeavour in the present paper to point out the errors which I conceive have been committed. I am induced to enter upon a criticism of the enactments relating to companies by the reflection that those enactments have on the whole failed to establish the law upon a satisfactory basis and to bring it into a satisfactory state, and by the further reflection that nothing is more calculated to lead to future improvement than a careful and dispassionate examination of causes of past failures.

Parliament has dealt with companies in two ways: it has done its best to suppress them altogether, and finding that impossible it has endeavoured to regulate them. In both cases the Legislature has acted with a view to the public weal, and in both cases it has committed grievous errors.

Let us consider the attempt to suppress companies, and the various modes in which this attempt has been made.

In the early part of the last century, as is well known, a statute was passed for the purpose of preventing the voluntary subscription of capital by numerous individuals with a view to its employment for their common profit. I do not stay to consider whether the schemes afloat in 1719 were laudable or not; even if they were not, even if they were all bubbles and swindles, the proper remedy was very different from that to which the Legislature had recourse.

The reasons for condemning the principle of the Bubble Act are, as I conceive, as follows:—

1. Because it is no part of the business of a Government to protect persons, capable of taking care of themselves, from the ruinous consequences of their own deliberate acts.
2. Because it ought not to be assumed by a Government that it is a better judge of what is for the benefit of its adult and sane subjects than they are themselves.
3. Because any attempt to prevent the commission of fraud on some persons, by prohibiting them and all others from engaging in what, apart from fraud, is unobjectionable, is invariably productive of more harm than good.
4. Because the only means of effectually preventing fraud in the getting up and management of companies is to require publicity and to make an example of those who are proved to have been guilty of fraud in any particular case.

Now, what is the principle on which the Bubble Act proceeded? Simply this: that because many people had been and might again be swindled and ruined by the promoters and directors of companies, therefore, there should be no companies at all. As well might the Legislature have said that because many people have been and may again be cheated, at cards, there shall be no card playing, at least, for money; or because many people have been and may again be unhappily married, all marriages shall be unlawful. Surely that is not the way to legislate for grown up intelligent men. The Bubble Act added one more to the list of offences, the existence of which is solely attributable to a ridiculous and cruel law. Socially and morally, wherein is it wrong for a number of people to combine their capital for the attainment of profit to themselves? and, admitting that such combinations are powerful for evil as well as for good, it is a clumsy expedient to treat them all alike in order to make sure of suppressing those which are disapproved. What should we say of a farmer, who, because his crops had suffered from some particular insect, were resolutely to set to work to destroy every insect on his farm? He would himself be the first to confess his folly, after it had been pointed out to him that many insects do him no harm and much good.

The Bubble Act, however, has been long since repealed. But it must not be supposed that when the Legislature repealed that Act, the principle on which it was founded was acknowledged to be erroneous, and was for ever abandoned. So far from this being the case we find the old leaven still at work; to it must be attributed the efforts made to compel every company to submit its proposed plan of operations either to the officers of the Crown, or to a Parliamentary committee; and to it also must be attributed the long and bitter, though ultimately unsuccessful, struggle against limited liability. It is not my purpose on the present occasion to discuss the comparative merits of limited and unlimited liability; all that I am desirous of doing is to protest against the notion that it is the duty of a Government to interfere to prevent persons from making contracts which affect those only who enter into them. For nearly a century and a half, from 1719 to 1858, this principle has been deliberately violated; and it has been assumed to be for the benefit of the public at large that speculation should be restrained by force. I say by force because it is by force only that the Legislature can secure obedience. Punishment in some form or other is the means whereby alone laws can be enforced; and the ultimate test of the goodness of the principle of every law has long since been shown to be this: is the evil against which the law is directed, one which it is expedient to endeavour to suppress by compulsion by public authority? If the answer be in the negative, then, however great the evil, the cure for it must be sought elsewhere than at the hands of the lawgiving power. Tried by this test every law having for its object the suppression of companies must be condemned. As long, however, as this test is neglected, as long as fancy and feeling are appealed to on the question whether this or that ought to be prohibited by law; as long as it is taken for granted that a law is the cure for every ill arising from objectionable conduct, as long as a Government is deluded by the notion that it stands in the same relation to the governed as a parent to his child; so long will the laws of human nature be violated, and legitimate freedom of action be more or less hurtfully fettered.

Instead of attempting to suppress companies, and of waging war with those who desired to better their position in life by the employment of their capital, an enlightened Legislature would have done nothing save to so modify the law as to render justice attainable by and against the associated members. A sensible, but non-paternal, Government would have devised some means by which companies might sue and be sued in ordinary courts, and would have passed a severe law to punish those guilty of fraud and malpractices, and would then have trusted the people to take care of their own interests as best they might.

It must not, however, be forgotten that companies might always be formed with the sanction of the Crown or of the Legislature. This, it is true, prevented the Bubble Act from being so intolerably oppressive as it otherwise would have been; but the necessity of obtaining from the Crown or Legislature special permission to do that which it ought to have been lawful to do without such permission, was in itself a great evil. Special permission to do a thing ought never to be required unless what is sought to be done is something which is in general prejudicial. Within the limits set by the test before alluded to, people should be left free to act; and it is only when they seek, for some exceptional reason, to pass beyond those limits that special leave to do as they wish should by law be necessary.

No doubt the notion was that by requiring the projectors of companies to apply to the Crown or Legislature, a check would be put on rash speculation; and it may be admitted that much fraud was thereby prevented. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered, that by requiring the sanction of the Crown or the Legislature to every scheme demanding more capital than a few individuals could furnish, a very serious check was put on the employment of capital by the unwealthy; and it not only seems to be, but is, unjust to say that two or three rich men may engage in any transactions they like, but that 100 comparatively poor men shall not do the same. Moreover I hesitate not to assert that upon the whole it is detrimental and not beneficial to the public to be compelled to obtain leave, before trying to increase their wealth in their own way. Time was, even in this country, when it was thought advisable that no book should be published without being first approved by some official; and it is even now thought proper in some countries to prevent people from moving from one place to another without previously obtaining the leave of the Government. All such restrictions on free action are, on the whole, extremely prejudicial, although it cannot probably be truly said of any of them that they never do good by averting harm. No company of course ought to have power to coerce other people until such power has been specially conferred upon it; but it is obvious that a law prohibiting the formation of companies without the special license of the Crown or the Legislature cannot be justified by any such principle as this.

The objections here made to the necessity of applying for charters or Acts of Parliament, for authority to do that which it ought to be lawful to do without special permission, are not in any way based on considerations of expense; at the same time it is obvious that the expense and delay of obtaining a charter or Act of Parliament seriously aggravate the evil of having to procure it.

I trust that I have said enough to show that the law prohibiting the formation of companies, otherwise than by charter or by special Act of Parliament, was founded upon principles which cannot be supported; and I pass now from the errors committed in legislating against companies, to the errors committed in legislating for them.

Here two great mistakes have been made. First, there has been no unity of plan; and secondly, there has been a great deal too much enacted. In addition to these, there are other minor faults discoverable in the statutes relating to companies, and in particular there is in most of them a deplorable want of clear and precise expression; but this fault, although practically of the greatest consequence, is one on which I do not propose to enlarge.

With respect to absence of unity in plan. In legislating for companies, Parliament never seems to have considered what was required to make the law suitable to the wants of the public; and yet a little attention paid to this point would have done more than anything else to render legislation successful and easy.

Before proceeding further it is necessary shortly to notice the evils against which it was necessary to provide, when it was determined to alter the law relating to companies.

First and foremost were the rules as to parties to actions and suits, which rendered it impossible either for companies to obtain redress themselves, or for individuals to obtain redress from them.

Secondly, there was the rule which enabled the separate creditors of a firm to levy execution on the partnership goods.

Thirdly, there was the rule that the creditors of a firm could have recourse for payment to any member exclusively.

Fourthly, there was the rule which prevented partners suing each other at law.

And fifthly, there was the rule that a partnership was dissolved as to all the members by whatever dissolved it as to one of them.

The first thing to be done was to prevent the application of these rules to companies; one simple enactment would have been sufficient for this purpose; all that was required was to provide some method whereby companies could be incorporated as a matter of right and not of favour, and by some cheap and simple process, and not by means of a special application to the Crown or the Legislature.

A little additional consideration would, however, have shown that, although incorporation would have removed all the evils above enumerated, it would have introduced others resulting from the rules relating to corporations. The rules here alluded to are:

First, the rule which rendered corporations not liable on contracts not under seal; and Secondly, the rule which rendered the members of a corporation wholly irresponsible for its debts.

This gives us the problem which the Legislature would have had to solve if it had set to work to legislate for companies on rational principles. What was wanted was a corporation capable of contracting by its agents, without the formality of any sealed writing; and a corporation, the members of which could, in case of need, be made to fulfil their engagements by a just contribution amongst themselves.

If this problem had been steadily kept in view we should have had a few simple provisions applicable to all companies of whatever kind instead of what we have had and even have still, viz., a number of different schemes applicable to as many different classes of companies, besides a host of other schemes contained in charters and special Acts of Parliament applicable to individual societies, and not appearing amongst the public general statutes. It is in vain to hope for good legislation on any subject if it is to be dealt with in the way in which Joint Stock Companies have been dealt with, that is to say, with a total disregard of all method and all plan. Where is the necessity for one statute for the regulation of railway companies, another for the regulation of banking companies, and another for the regulation of insurance companies? Where is the necessity or advantage of having some companies incorporated, and some not incorporated but empowered to sue and be sued by public officers? Where is the necessity or advantage of having several modes of executing judgments against shareholders, varying not with the wants of the creditor, but with the nature of the company? Why wind up some companies in one court and some in another, and some in several concurrently?

The want of plan and method which pervades the various statutes relating to companies is not only observable in their several general schemes, but also, and to a still greater degree, in their most important details. If any one is disposed to doubt this let him try and answer the question how is a judgment against a company to be enforced? He will find it impossible to give any answer which will be true of more than one particular kind of company. He will have to distinguish one company from another, and to give as many different answers as there are sorts of companies; and yet it is obvious that there is no necessity for all this. There ought to be some one method applicable to all companies without distinction, and by which their members might be compelled to fulfil their engagements.

But it may be said the laws have been already consolidated, and the want of unity and simplicity complained of has recently been supplied. It is greatly to be wished that this were true; but in fact no attempt has yet been made to do more than consolidate first the laws relating to those companies which, like railway companies, cannot be carried on without interfering with private property; and secondly, the laws relating to registered Joint Stock Companies. But there are numbers of companies to which the laws thus consolidated have no application. There are coal and iron mining companies; there are banking companies still governed by the 7 Geo. 4, c. 46; there are chartered companies; there are companies governed by the Letters Patent Act, (7 Will. 4. & 1 Vict. c. 73), and there are numerous insurance and other companies governed by special Acts of their own. No attempt has been made to deal with these, and even the Bill brought into Parliament last session for the purpose of consolidating the laws relating to companies only dealt with registered companies. What has been wanted from the first, and what is wanted now, is some enactment which shall apply to all companies without exception; nor, if the enactment were confined within proper limits, would there, I conceive, be any serious difficulty in preparing it. So long, however, as Parliament proceeds as it has done, to legislate first for one kind of company, and then for another, consolidating some laws and leaving others untouched, so long will the law relating to companies retain its unenviable notoriety of being, as it is, so intricate, confused, and perplexing, as to defy all attempts thoroughly to understand it.

Again, in legislating for companies, the very serious error has been committed of descending too much into detail. Every company should be allowed to make its own regulations for the transaction of its own business, and should not be fettered by minute legislative provisions upon matters of detail and of form. The Joint Stock Companies Act of 1844 is full of mistakes of this kind. Besides requiring all sorts of things to be inserted in a company's deed of settlement, and stating with minuteness what a company, when formed, may do, it goes on to specify in detail the rights of the shareholders and the powers and qualifications of directors, and to make minute provisions for the taking of accounts, the appointment of auditors, the keeping of registers, and other matters of that kind. Legislative enactments of this description cannot be enforced without a supervision which would be utterly intolerable; nor can the non-observance of them be punished without arousing a general feeling of disgust. They are wholly out of place, and their only practical effect is to throw doubts on the validity of bonâ fide transactions and to encourage dishonest people to repudiate their own acts on the ground of some want of conformity with statutory regulations. A vast amount of litigation has been created and injustice done by reason of the enactments prescribing the form in which contracts shall be made and shares be accepted; and it would be, probably, not very erroneous to say that the whole of this litigation and injustice might have been prevented if no such enactments had been made.

Moreover, enactments of the nature now alluded to are bad, because they cannot be practically carried out. Let us take as an example the 9th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, and see how courts of justice have been compelled to deal with it. The section says,—

1. That every company to which the Act relates shall keep a book called the register of shareholders;

2. That in such book shall be fairly and distinctly entered the names and additions of the persons entitled to shares in the company, together with other matters which I pass over.

3. That the surnames of the shareholders shall be entered in such book in alphabetical order.

4. That such book shall be authenticated by the seal of the company.

5. That such authentication shall take place at the first ordinary or next subsequent meeting of the company, and so from time to time at each ordinary meeting.

This section has, as might be expected, given rise to much litigation, the result of which seems to be that so long as a register of shareholders is kept substantially complying with the Act, it is a matter of perfect indifference whether the particular directions contained in the Act are complied with or not. It does not matter whether the book is called register of proprietors instead of register of shareholders, nor whether the names and additions of the shareholders are accurate, nor whether an alphabetical arrangement of their surnames is rigidly adhered to, nor whether the seal of the company has been affixed at the meeting specified by the Act or at some other meeting. As to all these matters the Act is said to be directory only; but that phrase, as applied to the enactment in question, will be found to mean that it is wholly immaterial whether the minute directions referred to are complied with or not.

I am far from questioning the propriety of the decisions which have led to the above result. They are clearly founded on a common sense view of the intention of the Legislature, but that very circumstance shows that the Legislature did not care whether its commands were obeyed or not. This appears to me to be a great error. If it is immaterial whether certain forms should be adhered to or not, the Legislature should not tie the public down to one form rather than to another; and, above all, the supreme power should not stultify itself by saying that certain things shall be done in a particular manner, and leave it optional with its subjects to do them in that or some other manner as they may find most convenient.

I quite admit that it should be incumbent on companies to keep accounts and registers, and that the shareholders should have some clearly defined rights, whether they have expressly stipulated for them or not; and I am not prepared to deny the expediency of compelling companies to publish periodical statements of their affairs. But what I am desirous of pointing out is, that the Legislature ought to issue no commands which it is impossible to enforce, and the non-observance of which it is inexpedient to punish, and that this principle has not been kept in view in legislating for companies. The more minutely the sovereign power prescribes how things are to be done, the more it trammels its subjects; and when it attempts to lay down rules for carrying on ordinary business, it inevitably does much more harm than good. Such matters are wholly unfit for legislation; and with a very few exceptions I think it may be truly said that every form required by law to be observed in transacting the ordinary affairs of life is neither more nor less than a public nuisance.

The mistake of descending too much into detail has been to some extent avoided in the Joint Stock Companies Act of 1856, and the device there had recourse to of appending to the Act a set of regulations which may be either adopted or not is ingenious and useful. The regulations not being enacted by the Legislature, may be modified by every company as occasion may require, and as they have not the force, so neither have they the rigidity of rules set by the law giving power. This is a considerable step in the right direction; but much yet remains to be done; for the foregoing observations on the evil of descending too much into detail apply nearly as forcibly to companies' deeds of settlement and regulations as to Acts of Parliament.

The remarks I have made upon the errors committed by the Legislature in dealing with companies, apply, it will be observed, to companies as going concerns. But when we turn to what has been done to facilitate the dissolution and winding up of companies unable to carry on their business, we shall find that even still greater mistakes have been made. Most persons who know anything of the practical working of the celebrated Winding-up Acts of 1848 and 1849 will agree in saying that they were productive of almost unmixed evil.

It was hoped that by the Acts in question, a company of many shareholders might be dissolved and wound up as easily as a partnership of few members, allowance being of course made for increased difficulties consequent on increased numbers of persons concerned. How these hopes have been disappointed, how shareholders, instead of being benefited by the Acts, have been ruined by the frightful expense consequent on their application, are matters which are unfortunately only too well-known. To what is all this attributable? Mainly I believe, to the commission of the three following errors, viz.—

1. The error of allowing creditors to sue individual shareholders during the pendency of the winding-up proceedings; 2. The error of allowing the same company to be wound-up in bankruptcy, and also, and at the same time, in chancery; and 3. The error of entrusting the winding up of companies to the masters in chancery. These errors have, however, been corrected, and since creditors have been restrained from levying execution against the members of their debtor companies which are being wound up, and since official managers have been brought more under the direct control of the equity judges, the evils before complained of have been greatly diminished. In the practical working of the Winding-up Acts, there is, however, still great room for improvement.

It is not, however, my intention to attempt to lay before the society any scheme for amending the law relating to companies; my object has been simply to draw attention to a few important principles which the statutes relating to companies have violated; and if I have succeeded in tracing the past and present unsatisfactory state of the law to the causes which have produced it, I shall at least have done something to further the objects of the society, and to discharge the duties of the office which I have the honour to hold.

THE LATE WILLIAM DAVID LEWIS, ESQ., Q.C.

There is something so inexpressibly sorrowful in the death of a young man who has sacrificed his life to the acquirement of a brilliant fame, which he never lived to enjoy, that whoever reads these lines cannot fail to lament the fate of the subject of the present notice. Perhaps in every other profession than that of the law, the early struggles of those who seek distinction may be attended with poverty and, no doubt, always imply a self-denial and resolution that are well nigh heroic; but no profession requires the same terrible sacrifice of all that human nature loves best, as the profession of the law; and never was there a more remarkable illustration of this than in the case of him whose early and unexpected death is now the subject of such deep and universal regret throughout the profession. Not yet having completed his 38th year, but having just touched the object of his high and praiseworthy ambition—attained thus early in life by an amount of labour almost incredible—disease and death forbade him to taste but for a moment the fruit of so many years' unceasing toil and self-denial.

Mr. William David Lewis was the eldest son of the Rev. George William Lewis, a clergyman of the established Church, residing at Ramsgate, who, although greatly admired as a preacher and respected as a man, at the time when his eldest son left home to commence the study of the law and for some years afterwards, had gained no greater preferment in the Church than a simple curacy, with its moderate stipend. Under these circumstances it may easily be conceived what difficulties attended the start in life and introduction into the profession of his son. At a very early age, however, he had set his heart upon becoming a great lawyer. The brilliant career of Lord St. Leonards, then Sir Edward Sugden, Lord Lyndhurst, and Lord Brougham, whose names were as familiar to him as household words, captivated his imagination and from his boyhood gave him a resolution and an enthusiasm in his reading, the result of which very soon became one of the wonders in the profession. At the early age of fourteen, while still engaged under the tuition of his father in the study of the classics, he diligently devoted his leisure to reading and transcribing the 2nd vol. of Blackstone's Commentaries. Before he was 15 he had not only copied nearly the whole of this book, but had made for his own use a summary of its contents. In 1838, while yet under the age of 15, he came to London and was placed under the tuition of Mr. John Rudall, who had even then a high reputation as a conveyancer, and whose chambers were much frequented by students. Mr. Lewis was not immediately entered a member of any Law of Court, probably as much because of the res angusta domi as on account of his extreme youth. So great, however, was his diligence, and so earnest his resolution, that in the course of three months from the time of his entering Mr. Rudall's chambers, he had completed a volume of precedents which he copied out with his own hand; and his custom was, having thus spent the early part of the day in acquiring familiarity with the practical part of conveyancing, to devote his evenings to the perusal of elementary treatises on the principles of law, which he purchased out of the savings of the necessarily limited allowance that he received from home. In after life he was sometimes wont, amongst his friends, to allude to the straits and contrivances to which he was driven to procure his first library, which he always regarded with peculiar affection. So far, indeed, did he carry his self-denial, that he frequently, for a whole week, allowed himself no better dinner than a crust of bread, in order that he might become the possessor of some prized volume. In Hilary Term, 1839, being then in his sixteenth year, he was entered a member of Lincoln's-inn; but he still, and for some years continued his attendance at Mr. Rudall's chambers, which was generally co-extensive with that of the clerk, and, frequently longer—his regular time for leaving being eight o'clock. Mr. Rudall has remarked of him that his pupil never on any occasion asked him a single question upon a point of law, or applied to him for a solution of any difficulty in practice. Mr. Lewis, when a student, invariably applied for his information directly to the text books and authorities; and afterwards, when his own chambers were much resorted to by pupils, he sometimes urged upon them the advantage of adopting this method. There is no doubt that, if intelligently pursued by an apt student, it is calculated to confer decided benefit upon him; for whatever is thus learned is more vividly impressed upon the mind, and principles thus acquired take deeper root in the understanding. We are so constituted that pain or anxiety is frequently the most effective aid to memory, especially when either is succeeded not only by the pleasure that comes from relief, but also by that which arises from having gained something at the expense of ease and indolence. To acquire a masterly knowledge of the practice of conveyancing, and of the principles of real property law, with such help only as one may obtain for himself by handling papers and reading books, was, certainly, a marvellous achievement for a mere boy. Perhaps there never was another instance in which a youth who had not yet attained his nineteenth year commenced the practice of a conveyancer under the Bar; at all events, the profession has no tradition of any learned and accomplished conveyancer in actual practice at the age of 19. Such, however, was the fact in Mr. Lewis's case. Keenly sensible of the sacrifices which his father had made on his behalf, he was anxious at the earliest possible moment to cease to be a burden upon those to whom he was lovingly attached; and while he was yet scarcely 19, he took chambers in Serle-street, and commenced practice as a conveyancer under the Bar. Two years afterwards (in Hilary Term 1844), having then attained the age of 21, he was called to the Bar. A year before he had completed and published his great work on the Law of Perpetuity, which of itself would be sufficient to hand his name down to posterity as one of the most remarkable of English jurists. As the achievement of a youth under 20 years of age it is unparalleled in the history of legal authorship. Lord St. Leonards was only 22 years of age when he completed his famous book on Vendors and Purchasers, which may be said to have reconstructed that entire branch of law. Mr. Jarman was also, no doubt, a very young man, and of only three years standing as a barrister, when he edited Powell on Devises. These are no doubt remarkable instances of very young men mastering most difficult and complicated branches of law; but Mr. Lewis's achievement was still more extraordinary. The subject which he selected for his first effort, and while he was not more than 18 years old, was unquestionably the most abstruse in the entire domain of law. Without anything like an accurate chart or compass, he had, almost unaided, to traverse and reduce into order a region at once vast and obscure—as he himself in his preface expressed it—to cut for himself “a path through a confused and extensive mass of statutes and of cases.” The task was hopeless to any except one who could grasp great principles, and by a philosophic elimination construct a system out of apparent chaos. The subject was not to be dealt with after the fashion of law book-makers, by a mere collection and classification of reported cases. It was manifestly one requiring the handling of not only an accomplished but a severe jurist; and such it had in the author who ultimately took it in hand. Mr. Lewis's book on the Law of Perpetuity would have been a very remarkable production for a mature lawyer, after many years' familiarity with legal subjects; as the work of a mere boy it is, and will always remain, a marvel not only for lawyers, but for psychologists.

While, however, the name of Mr. Lewis will be best known to future generations of lawyers as the author of an enduring book, his contemporaries have associated his name not less with the cause of legal education, and the reformation of our inns of court as seminaries of law. Towards the close of 1847, the benchers of the various inns of court resolved to resume their ancient and proper functions of legal instructors; and, to the honour of Gray's-inn, the benchers of that society, in the handsomest manner, offered to Mr. Lewis, who was then only twenty-four years of age, the lectureship on the law of real property and conveyancing. He willingly accepted this office; and with singular zeal entered upon the discharge of its duties. The success which attended his efforts was most signal, and no doubt very much contributed to the permanent establishment of the system of lectureships. The lectures and “moots” at Gray's-inn attracted great numbers of students for the Bar and junior barristers, including some who have since made a considerable figure, not only in the profession but in public life. Amongst others, Mr. Frederick Peel, then a student for the Bar, was one of the most assiduous students attending Mr. Lewis's lectures. Mr. Lewis also established annual honour examinations, and every year while he was lecturer bestowed a prize upon the most successful candidate.

With characteristic forethought and devotion to his subject, he commenced his labours as lecturer by an inaugural address in which he mapped out the entire domain of the laws of real property; and during the five years in which he held the office, he delivered every year sixty original and elaborate lectures without a single instance of repetition, or in any lecture going over ground upon which he had touched before; and he accomplished all this while he had otherwise abundant and increasing employment as counsel, both in chambers and in court. It is no wonder then, that at this time his naturally strong constitution suffered from so great a strain. With boundless faith not only in his intellectual but his physical strength, he taxed both to the utmost. Very frequently during his lectureship at Gray's-inn, he abstained from food from breakfast until he had returned home, between 9 and 10 o'clock at night, after delivering his lecture; and having dined at that hour, it was his habit to resume his own professional work until a late hour, although his invariable habit all the year round was to rise early for the purpose of getting through some of his work before he went to chambers. With any other habits, his increasing business would have made it impossible for him to discharge his professional duties; and in 1852 it compelled him to resign his lectureship, which he did with reluctance and regret, but not before he had raised the fame of Gray's-inn lectures far above that enjoyed by the lectures of any other Inn of Court. To the Benchers of Gray's-inn, and especially to Mr. Samuel Turner and one or two others to whom Mr. Lewis was mainly indebted for his appointment, and who cordially seconded all his efforts to advance the cause of legal education, he always expressed his deep obligation.

In 1854, the Government appointed a commission to consider the subject of the registration of title with reference to the sale and transfer of land. Among the commissioners were Mr. Walpole, Mr. Napier (late Lord Chancellor of Ireland), Sir Alexander Cockburn, Sir Richard Bethell, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Cookson. Without desiring to detract in the least from the labours of any of the other commissioners, we may fairly state that the services bestowed by Mr. Lewis in the preparation of the Blue Book which resulted from that commission, were extremely laborious and valuable. Not less than sixty pages are taken up with his sketches of a Bill to simplify the title to real property, and of another Bill to facilitate its transfer. These able productions were something more than the precursors—indeed, they may be said to have afforded the models—of the measures relating to the same subject which have since been proposed to the Parliament of this country, and have—as our readers are aware—been adopted by the legislature of South Australia. Several of the clauses in the Bill to simplify title have also since been substantially incorporated by Lord St. Leonards in his two recent Law of Property Acts.

Although we have already exceeded our allowable space, we ought not to omit to name Mr. Lewis as the founder, and, for some time, the most efficient supporter of the Juridical Society. It is only five years ago since he first suggested its formation and induced a few members of the Bar to join with him in its promotion. His object, and that of the society, was to encourage scientific investigation and study of law; and, judging by its published transactions, it has already achieved useful, and, in some instances, highly creditable results. Mr. Lewis contributed papers on the "Origin and Use of Legal Fictions," "Life Peerages," "Some Popular Errors Concerning Law," "The Law of Blasphemous Libels," and other subjects. He also gave to the press other occasional papers on legal subjects, among which his article* on the Bridgewater Peerage case, in support of the decision of the House of Lords,—the most elaborate and forcible argument published on that side—is worthy of special mention.

In Trinity Term, 1859, before Mr. Lewis attained the age of 36 years, he received a silk gown from Lord Chelmsford, who was then Lord Chancellor; and although his vigorous constitution had suffered to some extent from the unrest of twenty years, and the exhaustion of so much work, it was hoped that the comparative leisure which generally intervenes upon an introduction to the Inner Bar would have been sufficient to restore him to health; and for some time this expectation appeared to be well grounded. In 1859, for the first time since he entered Mr. Rudall's chambers, he took a long vacation. Immediately upon attaining the rank of Queen's Counsel he attached himself to the Court of Vice-Chancellor Sir J. Stuart, for whom he entertained the highest respect. He was also accustomed to express his special admiration of Lord Justice Knight Bruce. On one well known occasion this distinguished judge did Mr. Lewis the honour of desiring his presence before the Court of Appeal, as Amicus Curie, upon a case involving an abstruse question on the Law of Perpetuity. One of his last expressions was of grateful thanks to both these learned judges for their kindness to him during the short illness which terminated his career. The disease of which he died was aneurism of the heart, of the first approach of which he had an intimation in July last, when an eminent physician warned him of the risk of continuing to practise as an advocate. He continued, however, to appear in court until the last day of the sittings before Christmas, after which the disease became so much worse as to confine him wholly to his room. But even there, although occasionally suffering great pain, he insisted upon reading the briefs and cases which continued to be sent to his chambers, even after his illness became generally known, and he continued to do so almost up to his last day. Notwithstanding his previous illness his death was sudden and was wholly unexpected in the profession. The deep and general sympathy with which the news was received, speaks for itself both as regards its subject and also as regards the Bar, of very many members of which, at one time or another, Mr. Lewis had been an opponent, and must always have been a formidable competitor.

His career may be regarded as at once an encouragement and a warning to ambitious students of the law. He himself attributed his broken constitution to want of occasional rest; and on his death bed said that his premature break-down was owing to the fact that until he was made a Queen's Counsel he had never allowed himself a long vacation, or indeed a short one. It is characteristic of the man that he never was present at any theatrical or musical performance, and never once went to any place of public amusement, excepting the Crystal Palace, which he visited on two or three occasions. The only diversion from the labours of his profession which he ever allowed himself, was in the region of politics, of the philosophy of which he was an ardent student. He was very conversant with the constitutional history of England, and with such writers on ethics and economy as Lord Bacon, Sir James Mackintosh, and Mr. Stuart Mill. Mr. Lewis contested Pontefract, Sandwich, and Norwich, on Conservative principles, but never succeeded in his attempts to obtain a seat in Parliament. As a real property lawyer, very few of his contemporaries were equal to him. Perhaps none were much if at all superior in a general knowledge of English jurisprudence. While he had no pretensions to the first rank of forensic speakers, he was nevertheless extremely effective, not merely in argument upon points of law, but in statement of facts. There was a pervading enthusiasm in his nature which imparted force to all that he said; although he certainly wanted the quiet graces of oratory:—quod est oratoris proprium, apte, distincte, ornate, dicere. He spoke with distinctness and also with energy, but not with much grace—owing no doubt very much to the perpetual pressure of business to which he was always subject. Had his life and health been spared, he would most probably have acquired that quiet and polished manner of address which seems to be et jus et norma loquendi in courts of equity.

Mr. Lewis married at an early age, and leaves behind him his widow and one son. Although his father was a clergyman, his family have been long connected with the profession of the law—his grandfather and his uncle having been for many years town clerks of Rochester, and his brother, Mr. C. E. Lewis, being well known as an eloquent and rising advocate in the Court of Bankruptcy. Another brother was called to the Bar, and commenced practice in the common law courts. Those who recollect his learning and ability can even now appreciate the keen regret caused to the subject of our notice, by the decease, at the age of 34 years, of his accomplished brother. He died in 1848 of heart disease of an organic character.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Fenton v. Livingstone.—This case is fully reported in 3 Macq. 497; 7 W. R. 671. The facts of the case are as follows:—Thurstanus Livingstone married two sisters one after the other. He was domiciled in England; his two wives were both Englishwomen, and in England Alexander Livingstone, the defender, was born. He claimed, as lawful son of Thurstanus Livingstone, estates in Scotland, to which he asserted his right of succession as heir of entail upon the decease of his uncle Sir Thomas Livingstone, the person last in possession. Anne Fenton, the pursuer, claimed the same estates as heir of entail upon the decease of Sir Thomas Livingstone on the ground that all the preceding substitutes and heirs had failed, and impeached the title of the other claimant on the ground of his father's marriage with his mother having been illegal by the law of Scotland, and the issue excluded from inheritance to a Scotch estate. The case was originally heard before the Lord Ordinary (Lord Ardmillan) in Scotland, on an action of declarator of bastardy raised by Anne Fenton against Alexander Livingstone, the defender, and the Lord Ordinary decided that the defender was born in England, was the offspring of a marriage celebrated in England, between parties domiciled in England at the date and during the subsistence of the marriage; and that he was legitimate according to the law of England; and that his legitimacy ought to be recognised by the Scottish Court. The first division of the Court of Session having confirmed the decision of the Lord Ordinary, the pursuer, Anne Fenton, appealed to the House of Lords, and the appeal was argued before their lordships in the session of 1859, when their lordships held that a person born of an English marriage with the deceased wife's sister was not legitimate in Scotland as to the succession to real estate; and, reversing the decision of the Court of Session, remitted the cause back to that court.

The First Division of the Court of Session of Scotland has recently decided (Lord Deas dissenting), first, that as the defender was the issue of an unlawful marriage by the law of England, his place of domicile, he could not be recognised as a legitimate child in Scotland, and entitled to succeed to a landed estate there. In the second place, the judges were unanimous that by the old statute law of Scotland the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister was civilly null, and that the defender was therefore illegitimate, and not entitled to succeed.

SUMMARY of PROCEEDINGS in the CHAMBERS of the MASTER of the ROLLS and the VICE-CHANCELLORS for the years ending 1st November, 1859 and 1860. [Compiled from Returns made to her Majesty's Government for insertion in the "Judicial Statistics" of the above years.]

QUESTIONS FOR THE EXAMINATION.

Hilary Term, 1861.

I. PRELIMINARY.

1. Where, and with whom, did you serve your clerkship?
2. State the particular branch or branches of the law to which you have principally applied yourself during your clerkship.
3. Mention some of the principal law books which you have read and studied.
4. Have you attended any, and what, law lectures?

II. COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

5. Give a brief account of concurrent and peculiar jurisdictions of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.
6. How are the costs of the cause to be apportioned when the plaintiff has accepted money paid into court in respect of a particular sum or cause of action, but goes on for more, and is defeated as to the residue of his claim?
7. When any number of days, not expressed to be clear days, is prescribed by the rules or practice of the courts, how are they to be reckoned?
8. What is an issue? and how are issues in fact, and issues in law, respectively raised and decided?
9. A., B., and C. are sued together on a joint promissory note; they are also sued for breaking and entering a close. Judgment is recovered against A. alone in each action. Has A. a right to contribution from his co-defendants in either action?
10. What is the general Common Law rule as to interest on a debt, in the absence of any express stipulation to pay it?
11. What communication should an attorney have with the opposite party previous to trial, upon his documentary evidence; and what is the consequence of neglecting to take the proper steps?
12. In what instances can entries in the writing of a deceased person be given in evidence to prove the facts stated in them?
13. How is the debt affected in law when the payee of a promissory note dies, leaving the maker of the note his executor?
14. What are writs of Fil. fa and Ca. sa, and whence are these names derived? Can they be used together, and can the latter be always resorted to?
15. What penalty is incurred upon signing judgment for want of a plea, where the writ of summons has not been specially indorsed, when the defendant is within the jurisdiction, and the claim is for a liquidated demand?
16. Define general average and particular average.
17. When a factor sells goods for an undisclosed principal, in whose name may an action be brought for the price of the goods? and what is the rule of set-off applicable in these cases?
18. What modern alteration has been made in the law relating to the consideration for a guarantee appearing in writing?
19. In what cases has the consignor of goods the right of stoppage in transitu, and how is such right liable to be defeated?

III. CONVEYANCING.

20. By the Act of the last session, called the Trustees' and Mortgagees' Act, passed 28 August, 1860, in all cases where by deed, will, or other instrument of settlement, executed after the passing of the Act, a power of sale is given,—there being given by the Act authority to exercise such power of sale, in the way, under the restrictions, and with the powers therein mentioned,—describe in a general way the powers and authorities so given by the Act.
21. By the same Act, what power of sale is given to mortgagees under an instrument executed after the passing of the Act, in what events does it arise, by whom exercisable, and under what restrictions? what are the powers by the Act conferred on mortgagees of appointing a receiver,—and observing that these statutable powers may be negated by a declaration contained in the instrument creating the estate, would you, as the ordinary rule in practice, adopt them or not?
22. By the Act of the last session to amend the law of property, what is necessary, after entering up a judgment, to be done, in order that the same may affect land as to a purchaser or mortgagee, and does it make any difference whether such purchaser or mortgagee have notice or not of the judgment?
23. Where lands are devised charged with the payment of debts alone, or charged with debts and legacies together, or charged with legacies only, can the devisee in either, and, if in either, which of those cases, make a good title to a purchaser or mortgagee, without his being obliged to look to the discharge of such debts and legacies?

24. What lease is a person entitled in possession to a settled estate for his life under any settlement made after the 1st of November, 1856, empowered to make, as to the duration of the lease, the rent to be reserved, and other conditions?

25. What is the effect of such lease, as to the interests of parties entitled to any charge or incumbrance affecting the estate out of which the lease takes effect?

26. Where a will contains a power to raise money out of an estate, not confined to raising it out of the rents, or a power to charge an estate generally,—would such power authorise a sale of the estate, and also a mortgage of it, both, or either, and which?

27. State in general terms the rule for determining how far a power is suspended or extinguished by any act of the donee of the power having also an interest in the estate, affecting that interest, could such a donee, after creating a charge on his estate, exercise a power in any way defeating such charge?

28. If a tenant for life with power of leasing were to alienate his whole life estate, would the power be extinguished? Would a power in gross, that is, a power given to a person who has an interest, but not to take effect out of that interest, be extinguished by alienation of that interest?

29. Can an equitable mortgage on real property be created by a deposit of deeds, merely, without writing? If so, may or not the object of the deposit be explained by parol evidence?

30. Would such a deposit have preference over a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the legal estate, with or without notice of such equitable mortgage? Is a written memorandum of the deposit essential or advantageous?

31. If a tenant in tail, in possession, or a tenant for life, pays off an incumbrance, in either and which case, deemed to be extinguished? and in what way would you proceed, to keep alive the charge, in favour of the tenant, in whose case it would be otherwise extinguished?

32. Having reference to the Act of George the Second, subjecting to certain conditions, the conveyance of lands for charitable purposes,—state in general terms, what description of property are by that Act barred from being settled or charged for a charitable use, except in the way therein mentioned, and what is the mode of conveyance in which such object may be effected?

33. May an advowson be aliened for any estate, and may the next presentation or any number of presentations be granted away and if the grantee of a next presentation does not dispose of it in his lifetime, or by will, in whom at his death will it vest? Can the right of presentation to a church that is void be by any means aliened?

34. If you had to advise on the sale of building land, in fee, in lots, and were required to make the best provisions for the common use of streets, roads, drains, &c., or for the prevention of building, or securing easements, how would you proceed to carry out the object, either by vesting land for common use in trust, or by granting a rent charge in favour of one lot over another, or by mutual covenants between the purchasers framed in the best way the law would admit, so as to run with the land, or by what means?

IV. EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

35. Mention some of the ordinary cases in which the Court of Chancery exercises jurisdiction as distinguished from courts of law.

36. What is an ademption of a legacy? Give some instances of ademption.

37. A. by his will gives to charitable uses the residue of his property, consisting of consols, railway shares—a share in the new river company—shares in various insurance and dock companies—long leaseholds for years and leaseholds for lives—a common money bond—and arrears of unreceived rents. Are any, and which, of these gifts void, and why? and who is entitled to the benefit of such portions of the said property as do not pass to the charitable uses?

38. If A. assigns to B. a policy on his own life for a valuable consideration, and subsequently assigns the same policy to C. also for a valuable consideration, and B. and C. both give notice of their respective assignments to the insurance office, but C's notice is served on the office before B's notice,—what will be the relative legal position of B. and C.?

39. What is a distringas, and how may it be obtained?

40. A settlement dated in 1861 authorizes the trustees to invest the trust funds in Government or real securities in England; may the trustees invest such trust funds in any other, or what countries, and by virtue of what authority? Is there any difference if the settlement is dated in 1840?

41. Suppose a plaintiff appeals to the Lords Justices from a judgment of one of the Vice-Chancellors, and their lordships differ in the opinion, what is the effect on the judgment of the court below?

42. If the plaintiff's bill is dismissed with costs, and he appeals to the Lords Justices, and the appeal is dismissed with costs, and the costs are not paid,—can he appeal to the House of Lords before he has paid the costs incurred in the courts below?

43. What is the nature and extent of the security required by the House of Lords before their lordships give leave to appeal?

44. A. dies without issue intestate, leaving a mother, widow, two younger brothers, three sisters, and a nephew and niece, children of his eldest brother deceased,—upon whom, and in what proportions, will his real and personal estate devolve?

45. How soon after filing of a bill ought interrogatories to be delivered?

46. Within what time must a plaintiff except to an answer for insufficiency?

47. May the plaintiff except to an answer for any other cause than insufficiency, and for what?

48. State in detail the steps to be taken to get money out of court by petition when the money has been paid in by a railway company as the price of land taken by the company.

49. How may an affidavit be sworn by a person resident in Scotland?

V. BANKRUPTCY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

50. State generally the benefit intended by the bankrupt law to the debtor and the creditor respectively.

51. What are the conditions necessary to render a debtor amenable to the bankrupt laws, and what to entitle a creditor to obtain an adjudication?

52. Assuming a trader to be insolvent, what various modes are open to him in order to obtain relief through the bankrupt law?

53. Assuming a trader to be insolvent, what various modes are open to his creditors to obtain the application of the bankrupt law?

54. State the difference between the bankrupt law and the insolvent law as to the persons liable to each, respectively, and the relief afforded to the debtor.

55. Enumerate the acts of bankruptcy on which an adjudication may take place.

56. How many meetings are ordinarily held under a petition for adjudication, and state the nature of the proceedings at each?

57. What is the effect of the appointment of assignees on the bankrupt's property?

58. What is the effect of the adjudication on the rights of the creditor?

59. How are the joint and separate assets of partners applied in bankruptcy?

60. Explain the nature of a fraudulent preference made by a bankrupt in favour of a creditor.

61. Explain the nature of the right of stoppage in transitu of goods, and the circumstances which may give rise to it.

62. State generally, from what claims and demands the certificate of conformity discharges a bankrupt.

63. If a creditor holds property of a bankrupt as security for his debt, can he prove on the estate, and if so, on what conditions?

64. A creditor holds bills drawn by a partnership, consisting of A. and B. accepted by a partnership consisting of A., B., and C., can he prove on both estates, or what course must he pursue?

VI.—CRIMINAL LAW, AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

65. What is the object of criminal law?

66. How are offences usually classified, having regard to the procedure peculiar to each mode, and what is the distinction between the latter?

67. What in feudal times did the word felony import according to Mr. Justice Blackstone, and whence is it derived?

68. To what description of felonies does forfeiture of lands now attach—also of goods and chattels, and what is the lowest felony, and how is it punishable?

69. How are misdemeanours generally punishable in the absence of express statutory enactment, and what is the chief distinction between them and felonies as to forfeiture?

70. Explain the process by which a person charged with felony is to be proceeded against; how is his arrest and committal to prison to be secured?

71. Who may prefer the indictment, what must it state, in whose name must it issue, and before what tribunal in the first instance brought?

72. Before whom, and by whom, must the witnesses in support of the indictment be sworn, and who cross-examine them?

73. What offences are to be tried before the justices of the peace at sessions, and what are reserved for the higher courts? Mention some of the more important of the last named, and where are the reserved cases enumerated?

74. What is meant by challenging a jury? How many peremptory challenges can a prisoner make, and how many the Crown? State the reason for the distinction.

75. Distinguish murder from manslaughter, and burglary from larceny. Define the two last, and whence are the words derived?

76. When are burglary, piracy, robbery, and arson, capital felonies, and when not?

77. How can an attorney who embezzles property deposited with him for a specified purpose be punished criminally? State the statute and the punishment.

78. What is meant by the extradition of criminals? and how do the provisions of a treaty with a foreign state become the law? Give an instance.

79. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Justices on a summary conviction, if yes, what is it?

HILARY TERM EXAMINATION.

This Examination took place at the Law Society's Hall on the 22nd and 23rd January. W. F. POLLOCK, Esq., one of the Masters of the Court of Exchequer, presided; and the other Examiners were Mr. Ralph Barnes of Exeter, Mr. J. H. Bolton of Lincoln's Inn, Mr. W. Ford of Gray's Inn, and Mr. Freshfield.

The Master addressed the candidates to the following effect:—

Gentlemen, it is customary to address some words of welcome and encouragement to you, from this end of the room, upon the occasion of your presenting yourselves for examination; and although your time in this Hall is very precious, I will, with your permission, encroach upon it for a few moments before you enter on the business of the day.

You are now standing, as it were, at the threshold of that honourable profession to which you have dedicated your future years. You have probably not chosen this career without some consideration of the weighty responsibilities which attach to it. When admitted to practice as solicitors of the High Court of Chancery, and as attorneys in the Superior Courts at Westminster, you will become actual officers of the highest tribunals in the country. In the conduct of suits at law or in equity, you will take a recognized and privileged part in the administration of justice; and you will be no less accountable to the public for your performance of it, than to your clients and to your own consciences. In the wide range of general business, you will be brought into contact with almost every variety of human affairs. Your functions will be as multifarious as they are important. You may be called upon to advise and to act in all the matters belonging to the management of landed property. The most considerable commercial interests may occasionally be entrusted to your superintendence. The welfare and peace of families will frequently be confided to your care and discretion. There is no kind of intercourse between man and man,—there is no difficult complication of circumstances—in which you may not be called upon to render counsel and assistance.

I need not remind you, that for the upright and efficient discharge of duties, often so arduous and so delicate, two things are mainly requisite—I mean Integrity and Knowledge. A high sense of honour ought to be the life and soul of your vocation. Without it, knowledge can have no healthy existence; and is even in danger of becoming an instrument rather for evil than for good. On the other hand, mere honesty of purpose, unsupported by adequate professional skill, is of little avail; and can sustain only a feeble contention in the battle of the world. Rectitude and ability must be combined—the moral sense and the intellect must both be disciplined—if you desire to make your exertions useful to others and to yourselves.

Of your general fitness to be admitted as members of such a profession, we have already satisfied ourselves, so far as an opinion can be formed upon the experience of past conduct, afforded by your testimonials. It remains for us to test your proficiency in the various branches of legal knowledge in which you are about to be questioned. In this final ordeal we wish success for all. To some we shall have the gratification of awarding the honorary distinctions placed at our disposal, which now give an interest to this Examination, not always possessed by it, and which as we trust have not been without their influence in animating your studies, and improving their character. Allow me to add that we shall be obliged if you will confine your answers to meeting the questions laid before you. Let the answers be simple and concise; let them be free from prolixity, and from the display of more knowledge than is required for the fair elucidation of the immediate subject of inquiry. In conclusion, let me beg you not to think it unworthy of your attention to bestow some pains upon the mechanical process of making your writing distinct. No one now holds it "a baseness to write fair". It will do yourselves service, and will materially lighten the labours of the Examiners, if you will be so good as to write legibly. Once more, we wish you all a good deliverance.

EXAMINATIONS AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

HILARY TERM, 1861.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended the following gentlemen, under the age of 26, as being entitled to honorary distinction:—

Thomas Henry Bartlett, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Matthews, Son, & Stoton, of Arthur-street West, London-bridge.

Alfred Fox, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Messrs. J. E. Fox & Son, of Finsbury circus, London.

Thomas Wilson Spencer, aged 21, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Spencer, of Keighley; and Messrs. Mackeson & Goldring, of Lincoln's-inn-fields, London.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded the following prizes of books:—

To Mr. Bartlett, the prize of the Honourable Society of Clifford's-inn.

To Mr. Fox, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

To Mr. Spencer, one of the prizes of the Incorporated Law Society.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates, whose names are placed in alphabetical order, passed examinations which entitle them to commendation:—

Robert Blyth, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Mr. Andrew Meggy, of Chelmsford, and Mr. John White, of Bargeyard Chambers, London.

Peter Gedge, aged 22, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Jackson & Sparke, of Bury St. Edmunds, and Mr. Thomas Henry Dixon, of New Boswell-court, London.

Augustus Henry Reid, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Lloyd & Rule, of Milk-street, London.

Thomas Needham Sheffield, aged 23, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Sheffield, of Old Broad-street, London.

The Council have accordingly awarded them certificates of merit.

The examiners have further announced to the following candidates that their answers to the questions at the examination were highly satisfactory, and would have entitled them to prizes or certificates of merit, if they had been under the age of 26:—

Edward White Bewley, aged 29, who served his clerkship to Mr. John Hunt Thursfield, of Wednesbury.

James Pullen Knott, aged 39, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Sandys and Hill, of Gray's Inn, London.

James Pearse, B.A. aged 34, who served his clerkship to Mr. Theod William Pearse, of Bedford.

ESTATE AT GREAT CORBY FOR SALE.

TO BE SOLD BY AUCTION, at the house of Mr.

William Robinson, Innkeeper, GREAT CORBY, known by the sign of THE QUEEN, on MONDAY, the 11th day of FEBRUARY, 1861, at THREE o'clock in the afternoon, either together or in lots, and subject to conditions to be then and there produced, Mr. WILLIAM ROBINSON, Auctioneer.

All that valuable FREEHOLD and CUSTOMARY ESTATE, situate at Great Corby, in the parish of Wetheral, in the County of Cumberland, late the property of Mr. Thomas Bowman, deceased, consisting of a dwelling house, farm buildings, and 44a. 3r. 12p., more or less, of arable, meadow, pasture, and woodland.

There is a valuable Freestone Quarry on the estate, the right to work which belongs jointly to this estate and an adjoining property.

A small portion only of the estate is customary parcel of the Manor of Wetheral, subject to the payment of the yearly customary rent of 4s., and a fine of four times the amount on death or alienation.

The land is for the most part of very excellent quality, and very conveniently situated, being about five miles from Carlisle, and contiguous to the village of Great Corby, which is within a mile of the Wetheral Station of the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway.

There are several good sites for building on the estate, commanding extensive prospects of the surrounding country.

The property having been in the occupation of the late owner at the time of his death, possession of the land can be given immediately after the sale.

Further particulars may be known on application to Mr. JOHN NANSON, Solicitor, 9, Castle-street, Carlisle, where a plan of the estate can be seen, or to Mr. JOHN BOWMAN, of Great Corby, the Trustee for Sale, who will send a person to show the property. Printed particulars will shortly be ready, and may be had on application to Mr. JOHN NANSON Solicitor, Carlisle.

CURRENT TOPICS.

From the intimations contained in the Queen's Speech, and still more if one is to credit common rumour, it would appear that Sir Richard Bethell will be the principal figure in the House of Commons during the present session. Parliamentary Reform being indefinitely postponed, the amendment of the law is considered to be a subject of sufficient importance to engross the attention of Parliament almost exclusively for months to come. A new Copyright Bill, and a new Bill to Amend the Law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency, will open the campaign. A Bill to Facilitate the Transfer of Land is also in the Ministerial programme, as it was last session; but whether there is any serious intention of proceeding with this measure, we have yet no means of judging. We see that already our old friends, the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills, which have done such good suit and service to so many governments, law officers, statute law commissioners, and Parliamentary draftsmen, are again on the tapis. It is to be hoped that now, at length, they are fairly presentable, and that after so many years of probation, Parliament may venture to give them its sanction. We shall not fail throughout the session to keep our readers informed of the various measures before either House, particularly affecting the interests of lawyers; and we hope to have the advantage of their suggestions and assistance, in forming our opinions on such Bills as they from time to time are introduced to Parliament.

In pursuance of the power given to the Lord Chancellor by the Law of Property Act of last session, his lordship has just issued a General Order, by which cash under the control of the Court may be invested in Bank Stock, East India Stock, Exchequer Bills, and £2 10s. per Cent. Annuities, and upon mortgage of freehold and copyhold estates respectively in England and Wales; as well as in Consolidated £3 per Cent. Annuities, Reduced £3 per Cent. Annuities, and New £3 per Cent. Annuities.

It must be gratifying to all those who feel any interest in the well-being of the legal profession to observe in the recent list of articulated clerks who have passed their examination an increasing number of University graduates. The question has been very much discussed, no doubt, whether the training obtained at a University is a sufficient compensation to a young man intending to practise as a solicitor, for the compulsory postponement of professional education which is involved in the attainment of a University degree. This consideration, however, has been almost removed by the Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act of last session; but even if it were not, we should consider, in the case of a youth postponing his articles until he had graduated at a University, that he had thereby contributed as much to his own advantage and future prospects as he had to the general credit and dignity of the profession.

At a meeting of the Juridical Society on Monday evening, Mr. Denman read a very able and interesting paper on the case of Anderson, the fugitive slave. In the animated discussion which followed, the majority of speakers were decidedly against the ruling of the Court of Queen's Bench in Canada, Mr. Denman's argument being strongly to the same effect. The discussion will be resumed on the next night of meeting, after which we hope to lay before our readers some account of it, together with a summary of the paper which gave rise to it.

The Globe of last evening states that it was rumoured in Westminster Hall yesterday morning, that the following gentlemen will be called to the rank of Queen's Counsel previous to the Spring Circuits:—Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Karlake, Mr. Digby Seymour, M.P., Mr. Phipson, Mr. Mellish, and the Hon. George Denman, M.P.

ORAL EVIDENCE IN CHANCERY.

The substitution of a natural method (instead of a highly artificial and inconvenient one) of determining issues of fact in the Court of Chancery, has been a process of a very tedious character, which, moreover, has required no little pressure from without. Even now that a new general order of the Court has (we must admit in perfect good faith), embodied the main recommendations of the Chancery Evidence Commissioners, yet it can hardly be said that a complete victory has been gained over a cumbrous and obstinate procedure. This new general order, however, is a great instalment to the requirements of suitors and practitioners in the Court of Chancery, in a most important matter connected with the conduct of suits. Every suit involves either one or more issues of law or of fact or of both law and fact. But mere questions of law may be generally determined with a comparatively inconsiderable outlay. Where the facts are easily proved or admitted, the costs of suit are little more than the taxes imposed for the support of the court, together with the fees of counsel and the solicitor's own costs, which cannot be otherwise than trifling. But where the facts are disputed and both sides are prepared to enter upon a conflict of testimony, there is hardly any ground to form the remotest conjecture under the system now happily expiring when the affidavits, examinations, and cross-examinations of the parties would stop, or how many hundred folios of utterly irrelevant and useless matter might not be imported into the cause, under the name and pretence of evidence. Most fortunately for the suitors of the Court, and much to its own credit, this scandal will cease to exist after the 1st day of Easter Term, when the new system will come into operation. As that period is so near at hand it is desirable that solicitors should lose no time in making themselves acquainted with the important alterations which the new order will introduce into the practice of the Court of Chancery.

On and after the 1st day of next Easter Term the plaintiff or any defendant may, at any time within fourteen days after issue joined, apply by summons to the Judge in chambers for an order that the evidence in chief as to any facts or issues may be taken vivâ voce at the hearing of the cause. The judge, however, may refuse the application if he thinks it "unreasonable or made for the purpose of delay, oppression, or vexation." Where the order is made no affidavit is to be admissible at the hearing, in respect of any fact or issue included in the order; but the facts not included may be proved according to the present practice.

These are the main provisions of the new order, and while admitting their very great value we feel free to offer some observations upon them—having regard to the numerous articles which appeared last year in this Journal upon the Report of the Commissioners. Indeed, we need hardly do more than repeat the suggestions which we then offered. In the first place it is doubtful whether it will be found convenient in practice to require in every case where any party wishes to have the evidence taken visâ voce, to give to his opponent the opportunity of raising a preliminary contest at chambers upon this point; and it is difficult to understand upon what grounds such an application could be refused where there was a real contest of facts. We next doubt the policy of compelling the party applying to shape any particular issues, not coincident with his entire case, as the condition of obtaining an order for the taking of the evidence orally in open court. There is the further objection, that as to any issues prescribed by such order, no other than oral evidence will be admissible. It may thus happen that a plaintiff, having obtained an order for the determination of certain issues at the hearing, may be precluded from reading against a defendant the admissions contained in his answer, if the facts admitted happen to be comprised in the issues. Some inconvenience will also probably result from the co-existence, in the same suit, of issues which are to be determined at the same hearing, but in a very different manner. Where the judge directs certain issues of fact incommensurate with the subject of litigation, to be determined upon oral evidence, it is no doubt implied that the supplemental evidence shall be by affidavit. But if the issues of fact to be determined in one way are fixed beforehand, what reason is there why those to be determined in the other should remain vague and indefinite? and if these last-mentioned issues are not defined, it can hardly be the subject of wonder if the evidence adduced on both sides in respect of them should be frequently either imperfect or diffuse, if not both. The problem to be really solved is simple enough. No evidence, except what is of a formal character, is required where there is no dispute between the parties as to facts. It is believed on all hands, and expressly insisted upon by the Report of the Commissioners, that where material facts are contested between parties the evidence should be visâ voce, and given before the tribunal which is to decide the case; the new general order impliedly proceeds upon the same presumption. What is required, therefore, is to ascertain the existence and the extent of the contest between the parties as to facts.

How is this to be done in a manner most consistent with the rights both of plaintiff and defendant? First, as to the plaintiff: he is required to state in his bill such facts as he may conceive to be necessary or advisable to obtain the relief which he seeks. Is it fair, then, or consistent with the theory of equity pleading, to ask him to tender issues of fact otherwise than he has done in his bill? It will be clearly against the doctrine and practice of the court to oblige him to do so; at all events, before he has seen the defendant's answer. But it will probably partly admit and partly deny, or confess and avoid, the case made by the bill. If the defendant were obliged to do this in a strict and technical manner—according to the course pursued in courts of common law—the plaintiff could hardly complain, and after a due course of pleading the suit would necessarily result in some definite issue. But the system of pleading in Chancery, although apparently less scientific than that of common law, is certainly more in accordance with reason and natural equity; and hitherto neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has been prevented from stating his case in comparatively untechnical and reasonable language, without being formally tied down to such strict issues (often inoperatively strict) as prevail at law. The difficulty connected with the rule contained in the new general order is that, while the same latitude of statement is allowed to both sides, whoever is interested in having the contest of fact determined orally has thrown upon him the serious responsibility of picking out distinct issues from these comparatively indefinite statements; while the other side may be equally embarrassed by the fact that such issues need not exhaust the case or insure its decision in favour of the party who succeeds upon them.

It appears to us that the simplest mode of solving the difficulty would be to allow the plaintiff in every case to prove orally such allegations of his bill as were in fact contested by the answer of the defendant or as the defendant refused otherwise to admit, and equally to allow the defendant to use oral evidence; leaving it open to both parties in all cases to resort wholly or in part to affidavits.

We entertain great doubt as to the utility of the arrangement which has been made in reference to the examiners of the Court, and find it difficult to form any conjecture as to the utility of ex parte examinations before them, such examinations being deemed affidavits, and filed as such in the Office of Records and Writs.

The 23rd rule of the new General Order is also open to remark. It requires that an affidavit shall show the means of knowledge of every person making any statement contained in it, but this affords ground for a larger comment than our present space permits. On a future occasion we shall have some observations to offer upon this point.

It may be added that the main rule of the new General Order, which relates to oral evidence, appears to us to be inapplicable to petitions and motions.

We have freely observed upon some features in the new Order, which appear to us to be defects; but taken as a whole, it must be regarded as one of the most important and useful reforms ever introduced into the Court of Chancery, and we fully expect to see it followed by speedy and great results. It only requires a good system of evidence, joined to the present admirable system of pleading in courts of equity, and governed by their wise and equitable doctrines, to gain for these courts as great popularity and respect as the public odium and dislike which it was not long ago their misfortune to attract.

THE LAW OF STRIKES.

There are few social questions that have given rise to more discussion in the present age than those which affect the rights of masters and workmen. Political economists tell us that it is vain to legislate upon the subject. They say that the price of labour, like the price of everything else, ought to be regulated solely by the laws of supply and demand; and after centuries of fruitless legislation we have arrived at this conclusion at last. We leave both masters and workmen at perfect liberty to make between themselves whatever agreements they choose. We interfere only to protect those who are supposed to be unable to protect themselves, namely, women and children in factories and mines. In every other instance masters and workmen are free to enter into any engagement for the carrying on of any lawful trade or manufacture. But the liberality of modern legislation does not stop here. It is now lawful for workmen to combine for the purpose of raising wages as it is for masters to combine for the purpose of lowering them. The former, in short, are allowed to dispose of their skill and labour, and the latter of their capital to the best advantage. Such for five and thirty years has been the law of the United Kingdom.

But the freedom of action thus allowed alike to capital and labour has not had the effect of reconciling these rival interests. We need only refer to the history of the last eighteen months in confirmation of this fact. In no similar period, we believe, have so many trade strikes taken place, and upon no occasion have these strikes been organized upon a more extensive scale. It is true that the law no longer prohibits combinations of this kind. By the Act of 6 Geo. 4. c. 129, upwards of thirty statutes, some of them dating from the reign of Edward the First, were swept away. These statutes composed what were called "the combination laws," and they were repealed in accordance with the theories of modern legislation which have since prevailed. But the Act of Geo. 4. although it rendered trade combinations lawful for the purpose of either raising the rate of wages or of shortening the hours of work, contained very stringent provisions against intimidation in every shape. It leaves the workman at perfect liberty to combine with his fellows for a common object, provided he does so peaceably and without attempting to intimidate others. Any threat applied either to his fellow workman or to his employers is punishable by imprisonment.

There have been two instances lately in which the latter provision has been enforced. It is expressed as follows:—"If any person shall by violence to the person or property of another, or by threats or intimidation, or by molesting or in any way obstructing another, force, or endeavour to force, any journeyman or other person to depart from his hiring, &c., he shall be imprisoned, &c., for three months." Another section provides a similar penalty in case "any person shall by violence to the person or property of another, or by threats or intimidation, &c., force or endeavour to force any manufacturer or person carrying on any trade or business to make any alteration in his mode of managing such business, or to limit the number of his workmen, &c." Under the first of these provisions a workman was recently convicted and sentenced to imprisonment by one of the metropolitan magistrates for using threats for the purpose of inducing others to leave work; Perham's case, Law Journal, vol. 29, M. C. 31.* Under the second provision there was an appeal the week before last from a decision of the same magistrate to the Court of Queen's Bench; and as the circumstances of the case are peculiar, we shall, shortly, lay them before our readers.

On the 9th of June last, the appellant, William Walsby, was convicted, under the last quoted provision of the Act of George 4, for unlawfully on the 16th of May previous, by threats, endeavouring to force one Philip Anley, a builder, to limit the description of his workmen. Philip Anley, the respondent, was a builder in the city, employing about 100 workmen, and after the great metropolitan strike, which took place in 1859, Mr. Anley refused to employ for some time any workmen who declined to work under the so called "declaration," which was drawn up for their own protection by the master builders, and which was to the following effect:—"I declare that I am not now, nor will I, during my engagement with you, become a member of, or support any society, which directly or indirectly interferes with the arrangements of this or of any other establishment, or the hours or terms of labour; and that I recognise the right of employers and employed individually to make any trade engagements on which they may choose to agree." This "declaration," as our readers will recollect, proved highly objectionable to the working men, as it was obviously directed against the existence of those trade societies to which nearly all belonged. A good number of the men, nevertheless, returned to their work under the "document," as it was called, and at the time in question, there happened to be several of this description at Mr. Anley's establishment. On the 16th of May, the appellant handed to Mr. Anley a paper signed by himself and by about thirty other workmen, of which the following is a copy:—"At a meeting of the joiners in the employ of Mr. Anley, Tuesday evening, May 16, 1860, it was resolved that Mr. Anley be given to understand that, unless the men who are working under the 'declaration' in his shop be discharged, and we have a definite answer by dinner time to that effect, we leave work immediately." Mr. Anley refused to comply with this requisition on the part of the appellant, and those who signed it along with him and they all accordingly left his employment the same day. The only question was, whether the conduct of the appellant under these circumstances amounted to a "threat" within the penal provisions of the Act of George the 4th. It was contended by his counsel that no such threat as that contemplated by the Act had been committed. Every man had a perfect right to leave his employment if he chose; and the fact of the appellant having done so because his master refused to discharge an obnoxious workman, could not be regarded as a threat either against the person or the property of anyone. The Court, however, was of a different opinion. The Chief Justice in delivering judgment admitted that every man had a perfect right, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, to leave the service of his employer when he chose. He had further the right individually of giving the employer the alternative of discharging an obnoxious workman or losing his services. But in the present case it was not one but a number of workmen who made the demand in question upon the master; "and they all adopted the same course," said the Chief Justice, "with the object of preventing the master from exercising his discretion, and to coerce him." Taking the whole of their conduct into account, he was of opinion that it amounted to a threat within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Justice Crompton and Mr. Justice Hill were of the same opinion. The latter added that irrespective of the Act of Parliament, he thought the men were guilty of a conspiracy at common law.

The case of R. v. Bykerdike, 1 M. & Rob. 179, appears to be in favour of Mr. Justice Hill's view. In that case the workmen in a certain colliery objected to work with seven men employed in the same colliery. They addressed a letter to the manager to the effect that all the other workmen would strike in fourteen days, unless those men were discharged. They were indicted for a conspiracy, and Mr. Justice Patteson said, "the statute never meant to empower workmen to meet and combine for the purpose of dictating to the master whom he should employ."

But the law cannot be considered as yet settled as to what amounts to a threat under the Act of George 4th. Walsby's case, decided in the Court of Queen's Bench the other day, is consistent with the decision in R. v. Bykerdike, and the grounds upon which both cases were decided appear to have been the same. But there are conflicting decisions. In R. v. Selsby, 5 Cox, C. C., 495, Lord Cranworth, when Baron Rolfe, laid down the following rule as to what amounted to a "threat" under the Act in question: "A great deal may be said as to the precise words used. What I think you must consider is not so much the very words, as whether the fair result of it was to intimate to the person to whom it was addressed, that some bodily harm would happen to him." This is a different interpretation of the statute from that which has recently been applied to it by the Court of Queen's Bench; it is inconsistent, moreover, with that applied to it by Mr. Justice Patteson. It is clear that the latter authorities did not consider that any threat of personal injury was necessary to justify a conviction under the Act. In fact, neither in R. v. Bykerdike, nor in Perham's case, nor in Walsby's, was there such threat used.

It was said in the recent case of Walsby, that the workmen attempted to coerce their master, and that such coercion was illegal. But may it not be said, that every strike on the part of the workmen is an attempt to coerce their employers to come to certain terms? And yet strikes are now recognised as perfectly lawful. Where, then, are we to draw the line as to what workmen may or may not do? Lord Cranworth's definition of a "threat" is clear and intelligible; but the later decisions are not only inconsistent with it, but they unquestionably render the law both anomalous and uncertain.

* In this case the words of the threat used were, "If you dare work, we shall consider you as 'blacks,' and when we go in we shall strike against you all over London."

VOLUNTARY ANSWERS TO BILLS IN CHANCERY.

Customary practice is sometimes very useful, and, by long usage, may obtain considerable authority. But such practice may more generally be traced to an official than to a judicial construction of the rules of court, and as having been originated to meet the exigencies of a particular case, in which, probably, the parties were willing to waive all hostile considerations. Consequently, in some instances, such usage will not bear the test of a general application, nor harmonize with the express provisions of the written practice.

The customary practice with respect to the time for filing a voluntary answer to a bill is a case in point.

Rule 5 of the 37th of the Consolidated Orders (p. 120), provides that "a defendant not required to answer a bill may, without any leave of the Court, put in a plea, answer or demurrer, not demurring alone, within fourteen days after the expiration of the time within which he might have been served with interrogatories for his examination in answer to such bill." And rule 7 of the same Order (p. 121), provides that "where the plaintiff amends his bill without requiring an answer to the amendments, a defendant who has answered, or has not been required to answer, the original bill, but desires to answer the amended bill, must put in his answer thereto within fourteen days after the expiration of the time within which, if an answer had been required, he might have been served with interrogatories for his examination in answer to such amended bill, or within such further time as the judge may allow." The customary practice which has arisen upon a construction of the foregoing rules may accommodate "friendly" parties, but will not, we think, be acquiesced in by hostile litigants.

The construction alluded to assumes that "if an answer had been required," the defendant would have entered an appearance within the time limited for his appearing, and that the plaintiff would have served interrogatories within eight days after such limited time; thus allowing for the filing of a voluntary answer twenty-two days from the last day of the time limited for the defendant's appearance; that is, eight days to the plaintiff, and fourteen days to the defendant—in other words, thirty days from the date of the service of the bill.

Now it appears to us that such construction, generally applied, is inconsistent with rule 4 of Order 11, and altogether ignores rule 5 of the same order—upon both of which rules, the 5th and 7th rules of Order 37 are dependent.

The twenty-two days can be computed from the last day of the time limited for appearing only in cases where the appearance has been actually entered on that day. In all cases where the appearance is entered after the time limited, the plaintiff is entitled to more than eight days from the last day of the time limited for appearing within which to serve interrogatories.

We think that the proper construction of the rules in question is that where the appearance is entered before the last day of the time limited, the plaintiff is nevertheless entitled, under rule 4 of Order 11, to 8 days from the last day of the time limited for appearing within which to serve interrogatories; and where the appearance is entered on, or after the last day of the time limited for appearing he is entitled, under rule 5 of Order 11, to eight days from the day on which the appearance is actually entered within which to serve interrogatories; and that the "fourteen days" mentioned in rules 5 and 7 of Order 37 are not to be reckoned until the time within which, "if an answer had been required," the plaintiff might have served interrogatories has expired.

Or the argument may be stated thus:—An appearance must be entered. If entered before the last day of the time for appearing, the plaintiff has eight days after the time limited for appearing within which to serve interrogatories (see rule 4 of Order 11, p. 47); and the "fourteen days"—mentioned in rules 5 and 7 of Order 37, pp. 120 and 121—allowed to a defendant to file a voluntary answer, are to be computed from the expiration of such eight days. If the appearance has been entered on or after the last day of the time limited for appearing, the plaintiff has eight days from the day on which the appearance was actually entered, within which to serve interrogatories (see rules 4 and 5 of Order 11), and the "fourteen days" mentioned in rules 5 and 7 of Order 37 are to be computed from the expiration of such eight days. There need not, however, be much difficulty experienced in properly determining the time for filing a voluntary answer in an original bill, because an appearance is generally required, and is enforceable to an original bill. The case is, however, very different with respect to the time for filing a voluntary answer to an amended bill.

It has been shown that rules 5 and 7 of Order 37 are, in their construction, dependent upon rules 4 and 5 of Order 11, and that rules 4 and 5 of Order 11 involve, in their construction, the necessity of an appearance being entered. The provisions of the rules in question are, therefore, inapplicable to the case of a voluntary answer to an amended bill. For where the plaintiff amends the bill without requiring an answer to the amendments, the entry of an appearance is not required. And an appearance not being required, and therefore not entered, the time for serving interrogatories is not fixed, and cannot therefore determine—consequently the "fourteen days" after that time for filing a voluntary answer to an amended bill have no commencement, and therefore no termination; and here is a difficulty of which either plaintiff or defendant may claim to take advantage, according as any adverse proceeding may be attempted by the one party against the other.

The difficulty would be removed by the defendant's volunteering an appearance. But in a strict examination of a rule of court—as applicable to hostile parties—a voluntary proceeding is not to be assumed; and it appears to us that, in the absence of such an appearance, a suit in which the bill has been amended without an answer being required to the amendment is, as between hostile parties, completely shut up. To repeat the argument, the case stands thus:—If the plaintiff's time within which, an answer being required, he might serve interrogatories, has not been fixed, it cannot be determined, and therefore the "fourteen days" after that time allowed to the defendant to file a voluntary answer have not commenced, and cannot therefore have expired—consequently the plaintiff cannot shut out a voluntary answer by proceeding with his cause—and the time within which the defendant "might have put in an answer" not having expired, the "one week" after such time (see art. 1 of rule 12 of Order 33 of the Consolidated Orders, p. 101), within which the plaintiff is bound to proceed with the cause has not commenced, and cannot, therefore, have expired—consequently the defendant cannot move to dismiss for want of prosecution.

It only remains to suggest a remedy. The difficulties stated in the foregoing remarks, arising out of the rules of court as at present framed, may be removed by simply abrogating rules 5 and 7 of Order 37, and providing, in lieu thereof, that a voluntary answer, either to an original or to an amended bill, shall be filed within a limited time after service of the bill.

We take this opportunity of adding that it would be useful also to provide that in cases where a defendant is required to appear to a bill, and he is served with a copy of the bill and of the interrogatories, at the same time (which in some cases is very convenient and saves expense) the computation of such defendant's time for answering shall commence on the day following next after the last day of the time limited for his appearance, and not from the date of the delivery of the interrogatories, thus securing, by general order, and not merely allowing by customary practice, that the defendant shall have his full time for appearing and for answering.

PAR NOBILE FRATRUM.

Two cases which have recently come before the courts at Westminster suggest some grave reflections to both of the great branches of the legal profession, in respect of the admission of law students and articled clerks. In one of these cases it appeared that both the plaintiff and defendant professed to be students for the bar, and were, in fact, members of the Society of Gray's-inn. The action was brought to recover a few pounds, which the plaintiff stated he had lent the defendant. His defence was, that he had a set-off for a cloak and an American rocking chair, sold by him to the plaintiff; and also that the latter had made some overcharges in a very strange and complicated account between the parties. According to the plaintiff's own account, having passed the greater part of his life in America, he returned to this country five years ago, and through the exertions of Nicholson, the defendant, was entered upon the books of the Ancient and Honourable Society of Gray's-inn, as a student for the bar. Thereupon very intimate relations were established between the parties, and pecuniary transactions of a most curious character took place between them. It appeared from the evidence that David, the plaintiff, was a person of such antecedents as make it difficult to understand his influence directly or indirectly with the Benchers of Gray's-inn, amongst whom are some distinguished and many highly honourable men. The meagre report of the case which appeared in the morning journals does not enable us to present our readers with anything like a complete biography of this gentleman. Here and there, however, in his cross-examination ugly facts crop up in such abundance as to leave little room for doubt that much of a similar character, although irrelevant to the issue between the parties, might be brought to light by further and more general inquiry, such as one might suppose it was the duty under the circumstances of any Inn of Court to institute. Apart from a scandalously immoral private life, it came out upon the cross-examination of David that he had been charged in America with having forged a bill for £1,000, and that he now has an office in Buckingham-street, Strand, "where he gives out that he is ready to make investments." It further appeared that Nicholson, to whom Gray's-inn was, as we have mentioned, indebted for adding the name of David to its roll, had on some former occasion preferred a charge against David, or Keller, or De Keller, as he was then sometimes called, of "having buried a lady under a false name; according to the certificate she was described as the wife of Henry De Keller." The truth appeared to be that she was a mistress of David, who for the time assumed her name together with the embellishment of an aristocratic prefix.

Now we cannot help thinking that notwithstanding the charge of forgery in America had been dismissed for want of evidence, and although he may have denied with truth that he ever "held himself out as physician to the Queen of the Brazils"—in short, admitting that all the strange and doubtful circumstances attending his early and errant career might possibly be justified or explained to the satisfaction of a Judge of Virtue and a jury of moralists—yet the just ground of complaint remains that such a person was admitted without any inquiry whatever, on the payment of a few pounds, as a candidate for the highest branch of an honourable profession, and as the associate of a body of men who ought to be, and generally are, distinguished, not less by gentlemanly conduct than by their intellectual endowments. It is surely time for so great ad disgrace to be removed from the bar and the Inns of Court. If those who rule over the destinies of the bar think it unnecessary to institute any preliminary test of educational fitness in persons offering themselves as students of the Inns of Court, the least that the profession and the public have a right to demand of them is, that there should be such an inquiry into the character of these candidates as would ensure to some extent the rejection of men like this Mr. David, at all events until they were able to give a more satisfactory account of themselves than he gave before a Court of Nisi Prius the other day. We may add that even although the Benchers of Gray's Inn think it unnecessary to adopt this suggestion, they may, nevertheless, be induced to consider the question, whether they gain much credit by the fact that they number among their members men who ply the disreputable trade of money lenders, and that not with shame-faced secrecy, but in the face of day—in public offices, situate in the great thoroughfare daily traversed by members of both branches of the profession who frequent Westminster Hall. But if the society of Gray's-inn, regardless of public opinion, and only solicitous of adding to its revenue, persists in receiving into its bosom, without inquiry, men whose names have been notoriously mixed up with disreputable pursuits,

Mendici, mimi, balatrone, hoc genus omne,

it cannot be surprised if its own reputation is damaged by such degrading associations.

We now turn to a case of a cognate character in which the Incorporated Law Society will have to take the position from which we are content at present to dismiss the Benchers of Gray's-inn, and one Mr. William Henry Hudson will step into the place of Mr. David, to whom we care not to allude again. There was tried at Westminster, on Wednesday last, an action brought to recover the sum of fifty guineas which was paid as a deposit upon a treaty for the purchase of a horse, as a morning paper quietly adds, "under very singular circumstances." They were shortly as follows:—

On the 24th of October last, Mr. Tipping, a gentleman residing near Sevenoaks, was induced, by an advertisement in the Times, to go to a certain place called the "Paragon Livery Stables," at Hackney—where Croft (the defendant to the action) was then carrying on the business of a livery stable-keeper and riding master—for the purpose of seeing a certain "bright chestnut horse" described in the advertisement, and therein announced for sale. On arriving at the stables, Mr. Tipping saw a man just mounting a horse, which, on inquiry, turned out to be the identical "bright chestnut" of the advertisement. After some conversation it was arranged that the horse should be submitted to the inspection of Mr. Tipping's veterinary surgeon in the country, and the man then asked Mr. Tipping to give him a cheque for the amount of the value of the horse as a deposit. Mr. Tipping accordingly signed a cheque for fifty guineas, never dreaming but that he had been negotiating with the defendant Croft, instead of Hudson, as it afterwards turned out. The veritable Croft, however, was standing by all the while and not interfering. The horse, on inspection, proved to be far from satisfactory, and was accordingly returned to the defendant's stable; but was refused admittance by the defendant on the ground that "his brother was not at home." After considerable difficulty the animal was taken in, but the defendant wrote to Mr. Tipping telling him that it would stand there at his expense; as he had bought it, and as the defendant was not going to take it back. Mr. Tipping, therefore, brought his action for breach of contract; but, as the defendant put in a plea of infancy, the plaintiff afterwards inserted a count in the declaration for fraudulent misrepresentation and appropriation of the fifty guineas paid as a deposit. It appeared from the evidence of Hudson, who was put into the box to meet the plaintiff's case, that he used to go to the defendant's stables to ride, and that on the 24th of October last, just as he was going to mount the "bright chesnut horse," the plaintiff came in, and after some talk, handed Hudson a cheque in the presence of the defendant. On cross-examination, Hudson stated that he had been for four years an articled clerk to a solicitor; that previously he had been a sheriff's officer; that he had lent money to the defendant to start the business at Hackney; and that he had not been absent from the stables for more than two days during the two months preceding the 24th of October; that the "bright chesnut horse" had been bought at Aldridge's for £27 in the August preceding; that Hudson had pressed the defendant for payment of his debt, and had told him that he must sell a horse to do so. Accordingly, the advertisement was drawn up between them; and when the cheque was cashed, which was on the same day that it was signed, he received £35 out of the amount on account of his debt. He admitted that he suggested the plea of infancy after the action was brought; that he most likely told the defendant to put it on the record; that the defendant and he were often taken for brothers; and that when he was asked where his brother was, he might have said "that he was out," &c., &c.

The defendant Croft stated that he did not speak to plaintiff during the time he was at the stables. He led the horse out, but did not act as groom. He would not swear that he did not see Mr. Hudson take up one of the cards in the office with the defendant's name on it and give it to the plaintiff as Hudson's own card. Sometimes Hudson passed as his brother, and answered to the name of Croft.

At the close of the defendant's evidence the jury intimated that they had made up their minds, and on being interrogated by the judge said that they were prepared to go to the extent of finding that the whole transaction on the defendant's part was a fraud to cheat the plaintiff out of his money; and a verdict was taken for the plaintiff accordingly, with fifty guineas damages.

These facts and this verdict speak for themselves, and require no comment from us. It is not likely that such a person as Hudson would ever have had the opportunity of being a disgrace to the general body of articled clerks if his admission into it was made dependent upon the result of suitable preliminary inquiry. It is very improbable that this quondam sheriff's officer and practising jockey could have passed a suitable examination in either law or literature; but as nothing of the kind was required of him he had of course no difficulty in obtaining his articles, and thereby an opportunity, during the space of five years at least, of discrediting a class to which he ought never have been allowed to belong.

The act of last session has provided for the institution of an examination to be passed either before or during articles of clerkship. We earnestly hope it will be made a sine qua non of admission under articles; and that before long the profession may have some guarantee, in the shape of occasional examinations during articles, of the impossibility of an articled clerk devoting his time to the business of an ostler and the chicanery of horse dealing. Meanwhile, as Hudson has been deprived of the brotherhood of the infant Croft, we suggest to his fraternal regards the still more attractive claims of the enterprising plaintiff in the cause of David v. Nicholson.

It is stated that the claim which was made for both English and Indian income-tax upon Indian stock held in this country has been abandoned.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

VI. (Continued).

COMPULSORY DOMICIL.

At the conclusion of the former article, reference was made to the case of Ringer v. Churchill, and an extract given from the statement of the case by Lord Justice Clerk, with his observations thereon, particularly upon the two propositions, that the Court has no jurisdiction where the defender is not domiciled in Scotland, and that a merely fictitious decree cannot be given on account of acts done in a foreign country. His lordship continued, "In considering whether both or either of these propositions are well founded, as they involve the validity of the domicil referred to by both parties in this case, I feel it to be necessary to keep in view what the rule of law is in regard to the domicil of a wife. I cannot then entertain any doubt that the dictum of Lord Stair authoritatively settles the point, as in treating of the relation of husband and wife he expresses himself in these plain words, 'her abode and domicil followeth his;' and were anything else required in confirmation of this unequivocal expression, we see it very recently recognised in the clear opinions delivered in the House of Lords in the case of Warrender. It is no doubt perfectly true that in that case, reference was particularly made to the settled and permanent domicil of the party pursuer, as a landed proprietor residing in Scotland, but the opinion of Lord Stair is expressed without any qualification as to whether the husband's domicil is permanent or temporary, when he states that the wife's domicil follows his, and in the cases of Forbes & Levett, where the domicil was objected to as merely temporary. (Fergusson, p. 422). Lord Pitmilley, whilst deciding against any inquiry into the domicil of the pursuer, observed that in these two cases the pursuers were wives, whose domicil, except in the case of a regular separation, follows that of the husband. And no case has decided in reference to a domicil constituted by a residence of forty days and upwards within the territory of Scotland, that the domicil of a husband is not also to be held as that of his wife, or that she is to be considered as domiciled elsewhere and apart from him. If her domicil follows that of her husband it seems equally the same whether his domicil is temporary or permanent, and it has been shown that the rule has been declared in every case to apply only to the domicil of the husband which fixes his succession. The domicil of the wife, though in the view of law held to be that of the husband does not, however, avoid the necessity in such an action, of making her fully apprised of the proceedings instituted against her, if she happens to be beyond the territory in which her husband has acquired a legal domicil." His lordship then referred to the question whether the defender had had sufficient citation or notice of the action of divorce, and stated Lord Brougham's opinion in the case of Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. & Fin. 520), that the Scotch courts have jurisdiction in divorce, in a case where a formal domicil has been acquired by temporary residence without regard to the native country of the parties, the place of the ordinary residence, or the country where the marriage may have been had.

It will be seen that a great portion of this case turned upon the question of jurisdiction, in which the technicalities of the Scotch law make a prominent figure; but the English reader will not fail to have observed one great peculiarity with respect to the light in which the Scotch courts look upon domicil, namely, that for some, and those purely legal purposes, they recognize a species of domicil which the English law does not admit, a domicil very analogous to the fifteen days' residence within a parish or district which enables a party to publish his or her banns there, and which invests a foreigner (not being, I presume, an alien) with the power of suing for some purposes as a domiciled Scotchman in the courts of that Kingdom; and it is likewise remarkable that this power is not a mere phantom or shadow and fiction of law, but goes to a very vital part of it, and one in which it differs most materially from that of other countries, namely, in the law of marriage. If any further illustration were needed after what has been elsewhere adverted to in these pages with respect to the identity of the old word "settlement," and the modern word "domicil," this certainly would serve, I think, as a very strong one, for in both cases of forty days' residence in the territory of Scotland, and fifteen days or three Sundays' residence in a parish or district in England, the sole object is to acquire a particular legal status, et præterea nihil. In reference to this it may be as well to insert a few words which fell from Lord Jeffery in the case under discussion when he came to deliver his opinion. "I consider," (he says), "that when the word domicil is used to describe residence of forty days which subjects a man passivè to the courts of this country, it is really used in a sense which may be called metaphorical, it certainly is not used in the genuine and appropriate sense to which the well-known definition of the civilians applies: Locus ubiqueque larum suum posuit sedemque fortunarum suarum; unde cum proficiscitur peregrinare videtur, quo cum revertitur, redire domum." In the genuine domicil of a party his proper home is always included, it is where the seat and centre of his family and affairs are habitually placed. It is true that in a certain loose sense, a man may be said to have a domicil wherever he has a residence, and if a party has had a residence in Scotland for forty days, it is now a settled rule of the Scotch law, that he thereby becomes liable to answer in the Scotch courts as if domiciled there.

It is true that the doctrine is, that the domicil of the husband is the domicil of the wife; but the doctrine rests on the plain and reasonable presumption of fact; it is not a mere arbitrary dictum which is to be pushed as far as the mere letter can be carried without reference to its true sense and import; it is a doctrine founded on the presumption generally consistent with truth, certainly derived from regard to conjugal duty; that a wife always ought to be with her family. "Suppose," said Lord Jeffery, "that a married Englishman is sent to Scotland along with his regiment, or as a commissioner appointed to conduct some public inquiry, as soon as he has been for forty days in Scotland he would become amenable to our jurisdiction; but if his wife was left behind in England where his family is, and where his proper home ex hypothesi continues to be, can it be held that she is thereby also amenable to the jurisdiction of this court? Notwithstanding the strict nicety of the societas vitæ implied in the state of matrimony, in the eye of the law, I cannot see any ground whatever for holding that she would be bound to answer in our courts. Her forum remains the forum of her husband's proper domicil, and in the case now supposed the domicil never has been elsewhere than in England." His lordship was therefore of opinion that there was no jurisdiction in the Scotch courts. Lord Cockburn concurred in this, but Lord Meadowbank thought that there was, but in the minority. Lord Medwyn expressed himself to the effect that Lord Stair's opinion was only meant to apply to a proper domicil, not a temporary one, and that there was no jurisdiction, and Lord Moncrieff concurred, observing that in the case of Colquhoun; "Faculty," Coll. clv. vol. xiii., 347; "Morrison's Dict. App. Husband and Wife," No. 5, it was held that the husband was entitled to fix an abode for his wife different from his, but even when he did so, that he did not thereby change her legal domicil; but his own proper permanent home, remained in law her domicil, because it was his. But as the rule holds good only with respect to the proper and permanent domicil of the husband, the result is that a husband by gaining a temporary domicil of forty days does not thereby make that the domicil of his wife. A domicil of forty days has no animus remanendi. Lord Cuninghame considered that the conjugal rights of spouses, and the legitimate conditions and rights of children are not fit subjects of cognizance in a foreign court, but are peculiarly appropriated to the courts of the country where the marriage, and where the parties permanently reside and carry on their business. In this Lord Murray concurred, and therefore the majority of the Court were against the proposition of there being jurisdiction. I have gone thus at length into this case of Ringer v. Churchill, not by reason of the question of jurisdiction, barely as such, but because it has, as I conceive, a most important connection with the question of a wife's domicil, and all the observations that I have quoted bear, in some degree, upon that question; as do the following cases, the whole law on the point being collected in the last; Reid, McCall, & Co., v. Douglas, 11th June, 1814; 17 "Fac. dec." 643; see also Forrester v. Watson, Dec. Court of Sess., vol. vi., 2nd series, 1358; Grant v. Peddie, 1 W. & S. 716; Pirie v. Lunan, Morrison, 4594; French v. Pilcher, ibid. app. forum competens, No. 1; Wych v. Blount, ibid. app. No. 2; Alison v. Catley, 1 Dunlop, 1025; Yelverton v. Yelverton, 1 Smith & Sew. Div. Cas. 49; Dolphin v. Robins, 7 Ho. of Lds. 390. The first case of Forrester v. Watson, has reference to the jurisdiction of the Scotch courts in the case of temporary domicil of a husband in Scotland where the wife after separation had obtained a domicil, and been sued for adultery committed in Scotland.

The case of a servant involves another species of compulsory, or involuntary domicil: and the same question has often arisen whether servants of the Crown or of some large public body holding official situations in various parts of the world, came within this category, and the tenure again upon which they held their positions was also an important element in the consideration. This applies chiefly to the case of officers both naval and military upon half-pay, both in the service of the Government and of the East India Company. The case of Cockerell v. Cockerell, 4 W. R., p. 730, which I have referred to upon this subject in another part of these pages, laid down the law distinctly that the mere continued receipt of half-pay, where other circumstances went to constitute an acquired domicil other than that of origin, was not sufficient either to form a compulsory domicil in another country, or to prevent the acquirement there of a domicil of choice. In the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon's executors, Dec. of Court of Sess., vol. xii., p. 657, Mr. Gordon, a native of Scotland, entered the English navy in 1813, at the age of thirteen, and was engaged in active service till the year 1822, when he retired on half-pay. After his retirement he resided in lodgings in Jersey, till 1834, when he went to reside at Tortola, one of the Virgin Islands, having been appointed a stipendiary magistrate there under the Act for the emancipation of Negro slaves, the provisions of which expired in 1841. He subsequently was appointed president and senior member of the Council of the Virgin Islands, an office to which no salary is attached. In 1839, he got leave of absence and came to Scotland, on a visit to his relations. He married a Scotch lady, and was on his return with her to Tortola, when he died at St. Kitt's, in June, 1840. Mr. Gordon continued to receive his half-pay till his death. By the regulations of the service, naval officers on half-pay are required to reside in Great Britain unless they have obtained leave of absence, and they are liable to be called upon for active service at any time after six months' notice in the Gazette. The Crown had claimed legacy duty upon the ground of an English domicil, but upon these facts it was held that Mr. Gordon had acquired a domicil at Tortola, and therefore that his estate was not liable to legacy duty; vid. Thompson v. The Advocate-General, 13 Sim. 153; 12 Cl. & Fin. 1; 4 Bell App. Cases 1. The wife was also dead, and the Lord Ordinary found that her domicil followed that of her husband, and was at Tortola also.

ROLLS' COURT.

(Before the MASTER OF THE ROLLS.)

Feb. 7.—Business of the Court.—After giving judgment in a special case, which was of no interest to the public,

His Honour said, It is proper that I should inform the gentlemen of the bar, at the earliest time that I have been able to ascertain the state of my paper, that after the causes which are in my paper to-day have been disposed of, there are only nine which are ripe for hearing. I do not see any prospect, in the present state of the business, of the Court being fully engaged during this, which is usually the most laborious and severe, period of the year. The state of the cause lists before the Vice-Chancellors is such that there is no more business than can be reasonably disposed of by them, and I cannot therefore properly ask for a transfer of causes. This is the first time that such a state of things has occurred since I have had the honour of occupying this seat, and although it would certainly be more agreeable to myself, and probably also to the bar, to be fully occupied, yet I cannot but say that it denotes a very wholesome state of the Court of Chancery that one of the courts has not sufficient business to keep it in motion. This state of things may, perhaps, also arise from the assistance which the Court receives from the bar in disposing of the business before it, as well as from the unprecedentedly light character of that business. I have made this statement at the earliest opportunity for the convenience of the bar and the information of the public. I believe there are only fifty causes set down for the whole period of the sittings.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.)

Feb. 6.—Lord Enfield, attended by the Hon. George Waldegrave, the Speaker's Secretary, came into court to complain of his having been summoned as a juror to attend the court. Mr. Edwin James, on behalf of Lord Enfield, stated that it was not his wish to make a complaint in his place in the House of Commons, but his lordship preferred to submit to the court that he ought not to have been served with a summons, as he was free from liability to attendance on a jury, owing to his duties as a member of the House of Commons, which ought to have been well known by the summoning officer.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that the officers of the court had no authority to remove his lordship's name from the jury-book. The parish officers had the duty of making up the lists, and they did not always take cognisance of the result of the last election. He would state, however, that his lordship ought not to have been summoned as a juror, as members of Parliament were not bound to serve in any other court than that in which they had been returned to serve—namely, the High Court of Parliament, which was the highest court of the realm.

Lord Enfield and Mr. Waldegrave having thanked his lordship for so clearly expressing the undoubted privilege of members of Parliament, retired.

COURT FOR DIVORCE & MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

(Before the JUDGE ORDINARY.)

Feb. 1.—Cubley v. Cubley and Smith.—The petition in this case was by a husband for a dissolution of marriage, and a decree nisi was pronounced. An application was then made for an order for a permanent allowance to the wife. Alimony pendente lite had been awarded her at the rate of £30 a year. She prayed for the custody of her child, aged two years, and the petitioner stated in his pleadings his consent that she should retain it.

His LORDSHIP directed that the respondent should retain the custody of the child until further order, and that the petitioner should pay her 5s. a-week for its maintenance. He was not disposed to make the petitioner maintain her and her paramour. His lordship added that it had been suggested by the registrar that he had no power to make a final order as to the child's custody until after the final decree, and as the decree would not now become final until the expiration of three months, the order must be an interim order, under the 35th section of the Act. Some very pleasant questions would arise before long under the statute of last session. Would alimony pendente lite cease when the decree nisi was pronounced? At what time would the parties who had obtained a decree nisi have the privilege of marrying again? If a husband died between the decree nisi and the absolute decree, would the wife be treated as a widow, and entitled to a share of his property? Or would the suit be abated by the husband's death in the interval, so as to deprive the wife's proctor of his costs? The suit might not be at an end, for cause might be shown in the course of three months, and the petition might in the result be dismissed. Then were the material facts which might be brought before the Court only those facts which were within the knowledge of the parties, and which they had the means of bringing before the Court, or facts which had been discovered since the decree nisi? These questions would no doubt furnish them with a reasonable amount of occupation.

It was submitted that the respondent was not entitled both to the alimony pendente lite and to the 5s. a-week until the final decree.

The JUDGE ORDINARY.—She must make her election.

BUSINESS OF THE COURT.

The Court will not proceed with the list of petitions for dissolution until the 18th inst. During the last sittings the Court disposed of 57 petitions, including those which were withdrawn and those which stand for judgment.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Feb. 4.—The February general sessions commenced this morning at the Court-house on Clerkenwell-green, before Mr. Bodkin, the Assistant-Judge, Mr. Payne, Deputy, Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench, and a full bench of magistrates.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.

At a meeting of the Court on the 5th inst., on the motion of Mr. Alderman Wilson, seconded by Sir R. Carden, it was ordered that a copy of the seventh edition of "The Magisterial Synopsis," edited by Mr. George C. Oke, the assistant clerk to the Lord Mayor at the Mansion-house, be presented to each member of the Court.

Mr. Robert Edmund Mellersh, of Godalming, Surrey, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women, for the counties of Surrey and Sussex.

Mr. Richard Stubbs, of Bristol, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the counties of Somerset and Gloucester.

EQUITY.

PRACTICE—MOTION FOR RECEIVER BEFORE HEARING.

Pare v. Clegg, M.R., 9 W. R. 216.

In this case the Master of the Rolls decided that the Court would not appoint a receiver upon a motion before decree, the bill not having prayed that a receiver might be appointed. It has been long understood, that where an injunction or a receiver may be required in a cause before it comes on for hearing, the proper course is to have a specific prayer to that effect in the bill. Although very frequently an injunction or the appointment of a receiver by the Court is festinum remedium, and is obtained upon an interlocutory application; yet both, at all events the appointment of a receiver, may sometimes be regarded as substantive relief, and ought, therefore, to be the subject of an explicit prayer, so as to give the defendant at the earliest moment due notice of the case to be made against him. Indeed, according to the practice before 1852, it is doubtful whether the Court ever appointed a receiver, except upon bill (or claim) filed for that purpose; and so strictly was this practice observed, that if a defendant (and although he was in the same interest as the plaintiff) desired the appointment of a receiver, he must, for that purpose, have filed a cross bill. Where the bill, however, contained a prayer for a receiver, although it might have been refused upon the hearing of the cause, yet a renewed application might be made if, in any further stage of the cause, the appointment of a receiver was desirable. In the last edition of Dan. Chy. Prac., p. 995, it is laid down, however, that it is not in all cases absolutely requisite that the bill should contain a prayer for the appointment of a receiver. It is stated, that "if the facts of the case authorize, the Court may appoint a receiver, although there is no prayer to that effect in the bill." But the cases upon which this statement is alleged to be founded are not sufficient for the purpose. In the report of the first, Ramsbottom v. Freeman, 4 Beav. 145, it does not appear whether a receiver was prayed for by the bill. Neither in Hart v. Tulk, 6 Hare 611, does it in fact appear whether the bill contained such prayer. The same remark applies to Dowling v. Hudson, 14 Bea. 423. In Ramsbottom v. Freeman, Hart v. Tulk, and Dowling v. Hudson, the question was, whether notice of motion for a receiver might be served upon defendants, before appearance. The only case cited by Mr. Headlam, the editor of the last edition of "Daniel," which at all appears to sanction the account which he has given of the practice of the Court in this respect is Menden v. Sealey, 6 Hare, 820, in which Sir James Wigram, V.C., gave the plaintiff leave to serve a defendant, before appearance, with notice of motion for receiver. But although it does not appear from Mr. Hare's report that a receiver was prayed for by the bill in that case, yet it is stated that the bill asked for an injunction—a remedy of a reciprocal character being intended to prevent a threatened wrong, the object of receiver being to protect the property pending litigation. Thus we find that the practice of the Court is not correctly laid down upon this subject in the last edition of Daniel's Chancery Practice; and our readers may remember that upon the appearance of the work we warned them* that "it was one of the most dangerous books which a solicitor could place upon his shelves." Subsequent experience has justified this condemnation, which, perhaps, at the time was considered too strong. In this case, the passage which we have quoted appears to have misled the plaintiff in Pare v. Clegg into a futile motion, of which he had to pay the costs. Sir J. Romilly, M.R., observing that the "practice was not as stated in the passage cited;" but that "on a motion before a decree for a receiver, the appointment of a receiver ought to have been prayed for by the bill."

The question has been raised whether a receiver could be appointed at chambers in a summons suit. In Grot v. Bing, 9 Hare, App. 1, Sir J. Stuart, V.C., decided that where the application for the appointment of a receiver is made for the first time in a cause, it must be heard in court; but where the application is only to supply the place of a receiver already appointed, and whose office has become vacant by death or otherwise, it may be made at chambers. In a subsequent case, however, Brooker v. Brooker, 5 W. R. 382,† the same learned judge was of opinion that he had jurisdiction under the Chancery Amendment Act, 1852, s. 45, without bill filed to appoint a receiver, after an order had been made for administration upon summons at chambers—the ground of his Honour's decision being that such an order had all the effect of the ordinary administration decree, made at the hearing of a suit instituted by bill, and that the Court had been in the habit of interfering by granting an injunction or appointing a receiver, (although neither relief was prayed for), where a decree had been made in the suit. We are not aware whether this case has been since followed. Indeed, it appears to be in principle somewhat opposed to the ruling of Sir R. T. Kindersley, V.C., in Partington v. Reynolds, 6 W. R. 388, and of Sir W. P. Wood, V.C., in Sleight v. Lawson, 5 W. R. 589. But whatever may be the practice in summons suits, Pare v. Clegg is a distinct enunciation of the rule that in suits instituted by bill, the Court will not appoint a receiver before decree unless where the appointment of a receiver is part of the prayer of the bill.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

DEVISE SUBJECT TO PAYMENT OF DEBTS—IMPLIED POWER OF SALE BY EXECUTORS.

Hodkinson v. Quinn, 9 W. R. 197.

This decision of Wood, V.C., adds another to a long list of cases bearing on the much controverted question—namely, how far, and under what circumstances, a general charge of debts upon real estates authorizes a sale of the estate by the executors? The authorities on the question, up to a recent date (1858), are collected in White & Tudor's Leading Cases, vol. i., 2nd ed., pp. 71-77; and a short epitome of the decisions is all that is necessary to show the present bearings of the question. Sir L. Shadwell held, in 1843, that "if a testator charges his real estate with payment of his debts, that prima facie gives his executors POWER TO SELL the estate, and to give a good discharge for the purchase-money" (Forbes v. Peacock, 12 Sim. 541). In another case, where there was a direction in a will amounting to a general charge of debts on all the testator's real estates; and the question was, whether the trustees and executors together could make a title to the purchaser of that part of the estate which was devised to the trustees for special purposes, Lord Langdale considered that such a charge ought to be treated as a trust which gave the creditors a priority over the special objects of the devise; and that, as the Court, on the application of creditors, would compel the trustees to raise the necessary money, there was no reason to doubt that the trustees and executors might themselves do that which the Court would compel them to do on the application of the creditors (Shaw v. Borrer, 1 Keen, 559). This case was approved by Lord Cottenham, who observes that a charge of debts is equivalent to a trust to sell so much as may be sufficient to pay them (Ball v. Harris, 4 M. & Cr. 264). In these two last-mentioned cases, the difficulty which arises when the sale by the executor has to be effected in the absence of the owner of the legal estate, did not occur. That question was discussed in Gosling v. Carter, 1 Coll. 644; where Knight Bruce, V.C., held that, the executors proceeding to sell the real estate by auction under a general direction for payment of debts, the purchaser was not to be compelled to complete the purchase without a conveyance from the heir-at-law. In Curtis v. Fulbrook (8 Hare, 278), where there was a general devise of real and personal estate to H. for life, and then a devise of certain copyholds to B., and a direction that on the decease of B., the copyholds should be sold and the money distributed, on a bill filed after the death of A. and B., by the persons interested, against the executors and customary heir for a sale, the V.C. Wigram held that the executors were necessary parties to the conveyance, without absolutely deciding the question that they had an implied power of sale. In this case, however, it appears there was no direction whatever as to payment of debts. The important decision of Doe v. Hughes, 6 Ex. 223, is the next in order, where the rule was emphatically laid down by a court of judges, comprising Barons Parke and Alderson, that "an executor has NO implied power to sell a mortgage land which descends to the heir charged simpliciter with the payment of debts." This case is hitherto undisturbed by authority, and remains an exposition of legal doctrine, of the greatest weight. Doe v. Hughes, however, though unreversed, is at least modified in its consequences by subsequent decisions. Thus in Robinson v. Lowater, 17 Beav. 592, the testator, after devising his N. estate, gave his estate S. to his son R. for life, with remainder over. He further charged his personal estate with payment of a mortgage debt outstanding upon N., and of legacies and debts. If the personality should be insufficient for the purpose, he charged the S. estate with the deficiency, and appointed R. his sole executor. The son proved the will, and exhausted the personality in the payment of debts, the mortgage debt upon N. remaining unsatisfied. Afterwards R. sold the S. property to a person who took with full notice of the will, and through whom the defendant claimed. The plaintiffs, who were devisees of the N. estate, filed a bill insisting that the S. estate was still liable in the hands of the defendant to pay off the mortgage on the N. property. The Master of the Rolls dismissed the bill with costs. After referring to the cases, he said he was of opinion that a good title was made to the purchaser, and that the defendants were entitled to hold it, discharged of all claim in favour of the plaintiffs. This decision was upheld on appeal. Knight Bruce, L.J., said: "Does the case of Doe v. Hughes deal with anything beyond the question of the legal estate? Can it govern the present, which is an application to a court of equity to give effect to a charge?" Turner, L.J., said that the question was, how and by whom the money was to be raised. The purpose was to pay debts; therefore, it would have to be raised immediately, but no power was given to the devisees, and the devisees during the existence of the life estate, with contingent remainders, could have no power themselves to raise it. On the face of the will, therefore, it appeared to be the intention of the testator that the money should be raised by the executor. Robinson v. Lowater was followed by Storry v. Walsh, 18 Beav. 539. The Master of the Rolls there said, "There is no question that this Court holds that if an estate is charged with the payment of debts, the executor can make a good title to a purchaser by sale of that estate. There is also no question that if the estate is charged with the payment of certain specified scheduled debts the purchaser is bound to see that they are paid. It is equally clear that if the estate is charged with the payment of legacies generally, which legacies are necessarily specified, then also the purchaser must see to the application of the purchase money; but if it is charged with the payment of debts and legacies, he is not bound to see to such application, because the legacies are not payable until after the debts." In Wrigley v. Sykes, 21 Beav. 337, where a testator directed his debts and legacies to be paid out of his real and personal estate, and then devised certain freehold messuages for a term of years, of which one of the trusts was that on refusal by any of the beneficiaries of the term to pay his share of the debts, &c., within twenty days, there should be a peremptory sale, and after a lapse of thirty-three years from the death of the testator the surviving executors sold the estate, as they alleged, to pay the debts, the Master of the Rolls held they had power to sell, and decreed specific performance against the purchasers. The conclusion drawn by Messrs. White & Tudor is this:—That when there is a general charge of debts upon real estate the executors have in equity an implied power to sell it, and they alone can give a valid receipt for the purchase money; yet, as they do not take by implication a legal power to sell, the persons in whom the legal estate is vested must concur with them in the conveyance. They add, "The opinion amongst conveyancers, nevertheless, seems to be that when, subject to a charge of debts, an estate is devised to persons either beneficially, or as trustees for special purposes, a sale can be effected by them alone." Mr. Clayton, in his Elements of Conveyancing, pp. 104—112, relying upon Robinson v. Lowater, supports the view that a sale may be worked out by the executors alone when there is a general charge of debts; though he admits that the charge ought not to fetter any honest alienation of land by the devisee, and admits the danger of an arbitrary power in executors overruling all alienations by beneficiaries for an unlimited period of time. He even cites some very strong arguments against his own position, which we are led to suppose are supplied by Mr. Hayes, and to these he appends answers, the general result of his view being that a charge of debts in a will is sufficient to raise a presumption of intention that the executors are the persons to sell. He further urges the necessity, in the present state of authority, that testators should clearly point out the exact agency by which they mean the payment of their debts to be carried out. Mr. Joshua Williams, in an article of some celebrity (2 Jur., N.S., part ii., p. 68), combats these views. He points to the construction commonly placed upon Robinson v. Lowater and Wrigley v. Sykes, as showing that, after a lapse of many years, an execution under a general charge of debts may unexpectedly step in and sell lands which have been long held by the devisee; and moreover, that a purchaser from a devisee of lands charged with debts has, from the same cause, an incurable flaw in his title. The exposition of cases in this article alone entitles it to the fullest consideration. Lord St. Leonards alludes to it in the "Concise Vendors," 13th ed., p. 545 (n), by saying that "the two cases referred to have introduced considerable difficulty upon titles by implying a power of sale in cases from a charge of debts though the estate is demised to others. This is contrary to the received opinion. It would not be safe to rely on the authority of these cases." Mr. Dart also (V. and P. 3 Ed., p. 401) alludes to the point as one of the greatest difficulty and importance. "In such cases," he says, viz., where there is a charge of debts and a devise of land to A.B. in fee beneficially, A.B. not being the executor, "it has been the practice to accept titles from the devisee alone, without requiring evidence of the debts having been paid or causing the executors to concur in the conveyance. Recent decisions, however, tend to raise a very serious doubt as to whether this practice has not been erroneous, and as to whether the sale should not have been by the executors, or at any rate with their concurrence; even the efficacy of such concurrence is doubted by many practitioners upon the ground that the power of the executors to sell, if it exists, is a collateral power, and is incapable of being released." He adds that "in this state of the authorities it is impossible to lay down with confidence any rule of practice for such cases. It seems, however, to be reasonably clear that, as matters stand at present, a purchaser from the devisee in the devisee's absence cannot safely complete without either satisfying himself that all debts have been paid, or requiring the executors to authorise the proposed payment of the purchase money to the vendor." The very latest remarks on the subject will be found in a note to the same volume, p. 476. Since that was written another decision has been given by the Master of the Rolls in Sabin v. Heap, 29 L. J. N. S. 79. There a testator had commenced his will by a general direction that all his just debts, &c., should be paid and discharged; and after a lapse of twenty-seven years, although the parties beneficially entitled had been in possession, the executors exercised the power of sale, and the Master of the Rolls enforced the rule that they could make a good title, although they had refused to answer a requisition whether there were any debts of the testator unpaid. A stronger case than this can scarcely be supposed.

* 1 Sol. Jour. 296—315.

† On this case, see Recent Decisions in Chancery, 2 Sol. Jour. 435.

We now come to Hodkinson v. Quinn. A testator devised real estate at T., after his just debts, &c., should be first paid thereout, to C. and W., and the survivor of them and the heirs of such survivor upon certain trusts for the benefit of his two daughters, and after the death of the survivor of the two daughters upon trust to sell (the receipts of the trustees to be good discharges), and to pay the proceeds as therein mentioned. Testator directed his executors L. and F. to collect and get in all debts and moneys due to him, and sell all his personal estate and effects (not consisting of moneys), and apply the proceeds and all his ready money in payment of such of his debts as should not be secured by mortgage of the real estate at T. Testator died in 1838; the surviving daughter in 1859. In 1857 the plaintiffs were appointed trustees in the room of C. and W. In 1860 the plaintiffs put up the estate for sale, and the defendant became a purchaser, but objected to complete, on the ground that the concurrence of the testator's representative was necessary. This the plaintiffs were unable to obtain, as the executor of the surviving executor refused to act in any way. The defendant, on this ground, demurred to specific performance of the contract. The Vice-Chancellor said he thought the case might be disposed of on the fact of the refusal of the executors to act: but this he considered to be ground too narrow for the decision. He fully adopted Robinson v. Lowater, and even Sabin v. Heap, to the extent that in every case where there is a direction for the payment of debts, and no definite provision made by whom and when those debts are to be paid, the executors have an implied power to enter into contracts for sale. Whether or not they have a legal power, they at least have full power of insisting that the contract be performed by those who have the legal estate. Thus Doe v. Hughes and the cases in equity may be reconciled. His Honour then proceeds to deal with the question of the double power; one, the implied power in the executors to sell at any time; the other, the express power in the trustees to sell at a fixed epoch. And here, after stating what the result might have been, had the power of the executors been express instead of implied, which was not the present case, he said he could not consider the cases to go so far as to establish the proposition, that in no case can the devisee in fee sell without the concurrence of the executor. This was the point contended for by counsel on behalf of the demurrer; and it is certainly difficult, after Robinson v. Lowater and Sabin v. Heap, to see how that conclusion is to be avoided. The reasoning on this point was not full, but the Vice-Chancellor has delivered his opinion on the question, and the result is, that the uncertainty in practice which formerly prevailed remains in all its force. It is plainly unsafe for the purchaser to rest content with the assurance that all the debts are paid, even if he gets such an assurance, which the executor is not bound to give, for unexpected debts may at any time start up; nor can he compel the executor to join in the sale, or to authorise the receipt of the purchase money by the devisee. The case, indeed, does not go the entire length of the opinion above expressed. It rather turns upon the fact that the executors, who had the implied power, did not exercise it until the time arrived for the devisees to exercise the express power, nor did they interfere with the devisees in so selling, they merely refused to join. After this it was held, following Spackman v. Timbrell, 8 Sim. 260, and the remarks in 5 Jarman on Mortgages 141, that the estate was effectually put out of the reach of creditors. The doctrine in Robinson v. Lowater could not apply after a sale by the devisees had actually taken place.

His Honour then proceeded to notice Mr. Joshua Williams's arguments, so far as they went upon the ground that this was a collateral power in the executors which must extend over all time, and could not be released, except by the executors joining in the sale. His Honour was not disposed to go that length, but in the present case was of opinion that when a duty had been imposed upon trustees to sell at a given epoch, the executor could not afterwards step in and sell the same property after an actual alienation by the devisees had taken place. Looking at the decision with reference to the special facts of the case, the principles it involves will be found to go no further than in many previous authorities. In so far, however, as it declares, whilst upholding Robinson v. Lowater, and the succeeding cases, that these decisions do not always render the concurrence of the executors necessary in a sale by devisees, it leaves the practice where it was; or rather it seems to place intending purchasers less under the guidance of a general rule, and more exposed to the effect of special circumstances than before.

COMMON LAW.

Bates v. Bates, 9 W. R. C. P. 235.

By the 18th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, a writ of summons is provided to meet the case of the defendant, being a British subject, who is resident at the time of action brought beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, and not either in Scotland or Ireland. The form of the writ in this case is similar to that in ordinary use, except that it bears an indorsement purporting that it is for service out of the jurisdiction; and the time for appearing thereto, instead of as in other cases being fixed, viz., eight days—is regulated according to the distance from England of the place where the defendant is residing. The provision in question proceeds to enact (in case of non-appearance by the defendant), that if the writ was personally served, or reasonable efforts, to the knowledge of the defendant, made to effect such service, but the defendant wilfully neglects to appear or is living out of the jurisdiction in order to defeat and delay his creditors—then, in any of such cases, the court or judge may direct that the plaintiff may proceed in the action in such manner, and subject to such conditions, as to the court or judge shall seem fit, having regard to the time allowed for the defendant to appear being reasonable, and to the other circumstances of the case. It is, however, made a condition precedent to such order, that the court or judge shall be satisfied by affidavit not only with regard to the facts already mentioned, but also that "there is a cause of action which arose within the jurisdiction or in respect of the breach of a contract made within the jurisdiction." With respect to the ulterior proceedings of an action so commenced, and in which an order dispensing with the defendant's appearance has been obtained, the provision proceeds to require that the plaintiff, before he can obtain judgment, shall prove the amount of the debt or damages he claims either before a jury (as on a writ of inquiry) or before a master of the court according to the nature of the case, and as the court or judge may direct.

The present case arose out of the above provision, which it may be remarked, was intended as a substitution for the former unsatisfactory mode of reaching the effects of a defendant resident abroad, which might happen to be in this country through the pressure of a distringas. The order to proceed had been originally made on the terms of filing a declaration, and serving the defendant (who resided in California) with a notice to plead in fifty days; and it was now sought by the plaintiffs (on the ground that in the meantime the defendant was parting with his property to defeat his creditors), to vary this order by substituting eight days for fifty, and by allowing the notice to plead to be stuck up in the master's office, instead of being served on the defendant. And, moreover, that the plaintiff might be at liberty to sign judgment after proving his case by affidavit, or otherwise, as the master should think fit. This application was made and granted upon the authority of the case of Firmin v. Perry (see Law Dig. by Wise & Evans, 5 N. S. p. 1253.) There the defendant, having contracted a debt in England, went to reside in Australia. He was personally served with the proper form of writ, and required to appear in five months; and having made no appearance according to its exigency, the plaintiff then obtained an order to proceed in the terms granted in the present application. It should be remarked, however, that Mr. Justice Willes entertains considerable doubt whether, in such cases, a declaration can be dispensed with; and he states authoritatively the intention of the framers of the Act to have been, that in all cases where the defendant resides beyond the jurisdiction, and an order to proceed is made under this section, there should be notice of each step given to the defendant, and an opportunity given him to plead to the declaration.

CRIMINAL LAW.

AGENT—MISAPPROPRIATION OF MONEYS, WHEN NOT WITHIN 7 & 8 GEO. 4, c. 27.

Reg. v. May, 9 W. R., C. C. R., 256.

This is an important decision; first, because the species of misappropriation to which it refers is far from uncommon, and second, because it throws considerable doubt upon the case of R. v. Carr (Russ. & Ry. 198). The prisoner was an agent of several companies or houses of business, or at least was paid by them a commission on all business he could procure for them; and it was his duty to receive payment for the orders he procured, and to hand over any money he might receive for them forthwith. Instead of doing so he, on two occasions on which he had received money for the company, first neglected and then (on demand) failed to hand over the amounts; for which conduct he was prosecuted and convicted at the sessions under the statute of Geo. 4. But the conviction was quashed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that under the circumstances he was not the servant of the company. "He was not," in the words of the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, "subject to such control as is necessarily introduced in the relationship between master and servant."

In support of the conviction the case above referred to was chiefly relied on. Then it was held that a commercial traveller is a clerk of the house or houses with which he is connected, and for which he takes orders and receives payment of the goods forwarded; and that he can, as such, be guilty of embezzlement. But, as remarked by the court in the present case, an ordinary commercial traveller must obey the orders of the house or houses for which he travels—which distinguishes his position from that of the person then under the consideration of the court; for he was under no control at all. Moreover, the authority of the case of R. v. Carr has itself been questioned on the ground of its correctness depending upon the possibility of a man being the servant of several masters at one time. See per Parke B. in Reg. v. Goodbody (6 Car. & P. 667). It may further be remarked that in Reg. v. Walker (27 L. J. M. C. 207) it was held that a man who, being a refreshment house keeper, was also employed by some manufacturers of manure to get orders for their goods and pay over to them the moneys received in payment—the person employed being himself paid by a commission—could not be guilty of embezzlement in the character of a servant. The relationship between the parties was held to be rather that of principal and agent, for the prisoner's only obligation to get orders, was the loss of the commission he would otherwise earn.

Parliament and Legislation.

Tuesday, Feb. 5.

Her Majesty opened Parliament in person this day, and read her speech from the throne.

The address in answer to the royal speech was moved by the Earl of SEFTON and seconded by Lord LISMORE, and agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, Feb. 5.

NEW MEMBERS.

The following gentlemen took the oaths and their seats for the places appended to their names:—Mr. Layard (Southwark); Mr. Moffatt (Honiton), Mr. Hardy (Dartmouth), Mr. Pigott (Reading), Lord Bury (Wick Burghs), Mr. Beaumont (Newcastle), Lord Stanhope (South Notts), Mr. Vyner (Ripon), Mr. Barttelot (West Sussex), Mr. Wyndham (Cumberland), and Mr. Philipps (Pembrokeshire).

NEW WRITS.

On the motion of Mr. BRAND, writs were directed to be issued for the election of new members for South Wilts, in the room of Mr. Sidney Herbert, who has been called to the Upper House as Lord Herbert; for Bolton, in the room of Mr. Joseph Crook, who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds; and for Bradford, in the room of Mr. Titus Salt, who has also accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

On the motion of Sir J. ELPHINSTONE, a new writ was also ordered to issue to elect a member for the county of Aberdeen in the room of Lord Haddo, now Earl of Aberdeen in the peerage of Scotland.

THE BANKRUPTCY AND COPYRIGHT BILLS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that on Monday next he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency, and that on Friday, the 15th inst., he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to copyright in works of high art.

THE ADDRESS.

Sir E. COLEBROOKE moved the address in answer to her Majesty's speech, which was seconded by Mr. PAGET, and after some discussion agreed to.

Wednesday, Feb. 6.

NEW WRIT.

On the motion of Mr. BRAND, a new writ was ordered to issue for the election of a member for the county of Cork in the room of Mr. Deasy, who has accepted the office of one of the Barons of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer in Ireland.

FORGED TRADE MARKS.

Mr. ROEBUCK said the predecessor of her Majesty's present Attorney-General framed a Bill for the purpose of preventing, as far as possible, the affixing forged and dishonest English trade marks to bad foreign goods. He wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he was prepared to bring in such a measure in the course of the present session.

Mr. GIBSON said the Board of Trade returns for December had been delayed in order to afford time to make up the lading accounts of all cargoes properly appertaining to the year 1860, but they would be laid on the table in the course of a week. With regard to the question of the hon. and learned member for Sheffield, a Bill had been prepared, and would shortly be introduced into the other House of Parliament.

Mr. HADFIELD asked whether any powers would be taken in the Bill to negotiate with foreign states for a reciprocal measure of protection.

Mr. GIBSON said that this Bill was for the purpose of amending the law of England as it now stood in relation to the fraudulent marking of merchandise, and it would attach penalties to the use of trade marks for the purpose of defrauding purchasers of goods. Undoubtedly the Government would be very glad if Englishmen could obtain national treatment in all countries. This country gave foreigners national treatment with reference to trade marks, and as the Bill would render our law more efficient, it might induce other powers to give national treatment to Englishmen in foreign countries.

Thursday, Feb. 7.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTE LAW OF ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL gave notice that on Thursday, the 14th of February, he would move for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to offences against the person; and other Bills to consolidate and amend the Criminal Statute Law of the kingdom.

HIGHWAYS.

Sir G. C. LEWIS moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the better management of highways in England. The Bill was substantially the same with that which he brought in last year and which passed the second reading.

Friday, Feb. 8.

NEW MEMBERS.

The Hon. Captain Windsor Clive took the oaths and his seat for Ludlow, in the room of Colonel Percy Herbert, resigned.

Mr. Heygate took the oaths and his seat for Leicester in the room of Dr. Noble, deceased.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.

Mr. M. MILNES gave notice that on this day fortnight he would move for leave to bring in a Bill to legalise marriages with a deceased wife's sister.

Correspondence.

CHANCERY "CHAMBERS."

Now that the new system and practice established by the Acts and Orders of 1852 may be said to have been fairly tested, I wish to make some remarks, and suggest what I think would be improvements.

First, I would recommend that the Master of the Rolls, and each of the Vice Chancellors, sit two days a-week in chambers instead of in court. The advantages of this plan would be, that the chief clerks would not be compelled to act judicially. Instead of the judge coming to chambers worn out with court work, and the prospect of judgments to prepare when he gets home, he will come in the morning fresh and ready for his work. Instead of listening to a hurried explanation from a chief clerk, who gives his own view, perhaps omitting what might be urged against it, the judge would hear what all parties have to say. It must be recollected that many clerks of large agency firms, who were versed in the practice before 1852, and many solicitors who attend the judges, do not pretend to be advocates. At present they are hurried into the awful presence of a judge, and standing around him say something that may have relation to the summons more or less; they could tell their story in their own way if they had time; but does a judge at chambers ever listen to a long affidavit if read? I doubt it. I remember a story of a late master, not very remarkable for good temper, and an old managing clerk. The master interrupted the clerk before he had said two words, whereupon the veteran said, "Sir, if you will let me tell my story my own way, I can do so. I do not pretend to be as clever a pleader or advocate as you were" (that, no doubt, was a little bit of soap). Whereupon the generally irate master was calmed, and let the old fellow go on. The judges should let the solicitors sit down, and put them at their ease, so as to discuss the matter quietly in all its bearings; in fact, do what their chief clerks do. A very common objection to this seemingly obvious course (which evidently was contemplated by the Acts) is, that the chief clerks' valuable time would be taken up; but I would dispose of that as I would the objection which would be taken to the judge being obliged to delay his business in court—how will the work be done? It is unimportant, comparatively speaking, that it is done if it is not done properly. The more haste, the less speed. Suppose the hearing of suits is delayed, I do not see that it much matters. One of the judges, and generally another, can at the present time hardly get causes for hearing into his paper to make up the proper complement. I suppose counsel would not like it; but the juniors could in some cases attend the judge in chambers, and the seniors have a little more leisure for drilling or amusement. Surely a counsel with consultations from 9 to 10, in court till 4, and reading briefs till 10, would be glad of a little leisure. Possibly, on a future occasion, I may pursue this subject.

J. C.

The practice now constantly adopted in some of the chambers for the chief clerk not to say at the time of attending a summons, what is to be allowed to the solicitor for attending is very injurious to the London agent. He sends in his agency bill say twice a-year, and charges 6s. 8d. for an attendance; what benefit is it to him to find, when his country client is taxing his bill (as is now so often done), and gets a sixth taken off, making him pay costs of taxing, that 13s. 4d. is allowed, and if he charges 1 guinea, 6s. 8d. is added to the taxings off? And even if his bill is not taxed, everyone is aware of the great awkwardness of making additions to a delivered bill. I submit that what is to be allowed should be stated at the time. If the chief clerk likes to add anything afterwards, well and good. I would recommend solicitors to be very careful to get their attendance noted by the chief clerk, otherwise they will find out, perhaps a year and a half after the attendance, that they have been probably three hours before him for nothing—for not only may another solicitor object that their client ought not to attend, but if they have nothing to say, and say nothing (and perhaps even if they say something), the chief clerk will possibly allow nothing.

A CHANCERY CLERK.

HILARY TERM EXAMINATION.

Notwithstanding Mr. President Pollock's wishing the candidates "a good deliverance" with their examination, I observe that he and his brother examiners found it necessary to "postpone" (in more vulgar language pluck), no less than 28 candidates out of the 105 who were examined last term, or more than a quarter of the entire number—in fact, approaching very near to the greatest plucking examination yet known of, viz., Easter Term, 1850, when the proportion of the rejected to the successful candidates was one in every three and a half.

On looking through the questions they do not appear to me to be at all unusually difficult or abstruse ones, as is evidenced by the examiners commending no less than sixteen out of the seventy-seven candidates who passed; so that for the sake of the credit of the "knowledge" of the profession, I will charitably hope that the Christmas gaieties of the past month must have interfered with the unsuccessful candidates' brains, and that by next term it will have worn off, and that they will then amply redeem their present position by appearing in the then list of meritorious (passed) candidates.

Seriously speaking, however, the result of this examination does not speak creditably for the proficiency of the rising generation of articulated clerks, who, it is to be hoped, will not again let such a black list be recorded against them; and though I am not desirous that they should work themselves to death as poor W. D. Lewis literally did (whose obituary so opportunely occurs in the same number of the Solicitors' Journal as the result of this Hilary Term's examination), yet I am desirous that they should remember that unless they sow they cannot expect to reap, and that they will be as surely "known" in after life as is the tree by its fruits.

LEX.

COSTS OUT OF THE ESTATE.

The recent case of Wing v. Angrave (30 L. J., Chy., 65), decided in the House of Lords, is an instance of the loss which may be sustained, in the shape of costs, by a person being named as "a beneficiary" in testamentary documents.

The facts of the case are shortly these. Mr. and Mrs. Underwood, and three infant children, on the 13th of October, 1853, embarked on board the Dalhousie, for Australia. The vessel was wrecked, and the passengers and all the crew, except one seaman, perished. Mr. Underwood by his will, dated 4th of October, 1853, bequeathed all his real and personal estate to Mr. Wing, upon trust for his (testator's) wife, and in case she died in his lifetime, then upon trust for his three children, and in case they died under age and unmarried, then to Mr. Wing absolutely, and he appointed his wife and Mr. Wing executors. Mrs. Underwood by her will, dated the same day (made in exercise of a power), bequeathed her real and personal estate to her husband, and in case he died in her lifetime, then to Mr. Wing absolutely, and she appointed her husband and Mr. Wing executors. Mr. Wing proved both wills. There was no evidence whether Mr. or Mrs. Underwood survived the other. It was, no doubt, considered to be immaterial which of them was the survivor, as if Mr. Underwood survived his wife, then her property as well as his own would pass by his will to Mr. Wing absolutely (the trust for the children having failed by their death under twenty-one and unmarried), and if Mrs. Underwood survived her husband, then his property, as well as her own, would pass by her will to Mr. Wing. The law lords held (disentente Lord Campbell, L.C.), that in the absence of evidence as to the survivorship, Mr. Wing was not entitled; and they dismissed his appeal without costs, and refused an application that the costs should be paid out of the estate.

COPYHOLDS—PRACTICE.

H. is a tenant on the rolls as trustee for A. A. wishes to have the copyholds surrendered to him, but H. not being able to attend the court, gives a power of attorney to D. to act for him. C. being the solicitor to the lord, and also to H. & D., claims the right to prepare the power for execution by his client; but A.'s solicitor contends that it is his duty to prepare it, although his client is not made a party to it in any way. Can any of your readers say what is the usual practice in such cases?

A SUBSCRIBER.

APPOINTMENT OF NEW TRUSTEES OF CHAPELS.

Your correspondent "A. G. P.," in your number for January 26, does not state upon what points he seeks a judicial decision. I am not aware of any such decision; but having several times availed myself of the 13 & 14 Vict., c. 38, I have come to the following conclusions:—

1. That the mode of appointing new trustees provided by the Act applies chiefly to cases where there is no power of appointing new trustees in the trust deed, or where the power has lapsed. In such cases the Act is of great service, and saves the heavy expense of resorting to the Court of Chancery.

2. That the Act may also be used where there is an existing power in the deed, but that, in such cases, a short conveyance in the usual way is the better mode of procedure. In either case no enrolment is required, and the stamp and expense would be about the same. The power of appointing new trustees is usually vested in the survivors when reduced to a certain number, but sometimes it is vested in the members of the church, or their consent or concurrence is necessary. In the latter case it must, of course, be seen that the church meeting has been properly convened, and the consent or concurrence properly effected; and evidence of these facts should be preserved to accompany the title deeds.

The Provinces.

BIRMINGHAM.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, held on the 1st inst., it was announced that, in conjunction with the Chambers of Commerce of Sheffield and other towns, some progress had been made in the preparation of a measure having in view the registration of trade marks, it being in contemplation to introduce a Bill with that object into Parliament in the ensuing session. Upon this question Mr. A. Ryland remarked that the subject had been brought under the notice of the Board of Trade last year by some of the principal Chambers of Commerce in the kingdom, who considered it desirable that some plan for the registration of trade marks should be provided, so that in case of any legal proceedings being instituted, the proof of property in trade marks might be accomplished at a less cost than at present.

DARLINGTON.—Mr. Francis Mewburn, solicitor of this town, has retired from the profession. Mr. Mewburn was solicitor to the first railway company in the kingdom. He became solicitor to the Stockton & Darlington Railway Company in 1817, and continued to hold that office until the period of his retirement at the beginning of the present year.

WEDNESBURY.—At the Wednesbury Police Court, on the 22nd ult., W. Partridge, Esq., stipendiary magistrate, delivered his decision in the following case:—A short time ago the clerk to the Local Board of Health applied that the whole of any fines inflicted upon informations laid by the said board should be paid over to the funds of the board, and not, as theretofore, one half to the Stipendiary Justices' Fund, and the other half to the board. Mr. Partridge then said he would consider the case, as it was one of great importance. He now gave judgment. He said: "In this case, which came before me a few weeks ago, in which the Wednesbury Local Board of Health were the complainants, and in which I adjudged a certain defendant to pay a penalty of £5, for an offence punishable under the provisions of the Public Health Act (1848), the clerk to the above board subsequently applied to me to direct that the penalty so imposed should be paid to the treasurer of the said Local Board instead of to 'The Fee Fund' of the justices for the northern division of the Hundred of Seisdon; and in support of such application cited sec. 24 of the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 65 (the Stipendiary Justices' Act), and also the 11 & 12 Vict., c. 63 (the Public Health Act), s. 133; which last-mentioned Act, after providing that no proceedings for the recovery of any penalty incurred under the provisions of this Act shall be taken by any person other than by a party aggrieved, or the Local Board of Health in whose district the offence is committed, without the consent in writing of her Majesty's Attorney-General, proceeds to enact as follows:—'And if the application of the penalty be not otherwise provided for, one half thereof shall go to the informer, and the remainder to the Local Board of Health of the district in which the offence was committed, provided always that if the said Local Board be the informer, they shall be entitled to the whole of the penalty recovered, and all the penalties or sums recovered on account of any penalty by them shall be paid over to the treasurer, and shall by him be placed to the district fund mentioned in this Act.' Now s. 24 of the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 65, provides as follows:—'And be it enacted, that all other fines, penalties, and forfeitures, except such as are hereinbefore referred to, and which shall be imposed by such stipendiary justices, either alone or together, with any other justice or justices of the peace for the said county, which are or shall be by any Act made payable to her Majesty or to any person whomsoever, save and except the informer who shall sue for the same, or any party aggrieved, shall be recovered and adjudged to be paid to the treasurer of the public stock of the county of Stafford, and shall be applied in aid or reduction of the general county rate.' Now I am clearly of opinion, first, that the application of the penalty in question is 'otherwise provided for' by the 9 & 10 Vict., c. 65, s. 24; and secondly, that in the section already referred to a broad distinction is drawn between 'a party aggrieved' and the Local Board of Health; and having come to this conclusion, I hold that the Local Board of Wednesbury is not a party aggrieved within the spirit and meaning of the Act, and, consequently, I cannot entertain the application."

Ireland.

THE NEW JUDGE.

Mr. Deasy has been appointed to the vacant seat in the Irish Court of Exchequer. By this appointment a vacancy will occur in the representation of the county of Cork.

THE LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.

It is stated that the official and formal notification has been given to the Solicitor-General (Mr. O'Hagan) and to Mr. Serjeant Lawson, that the former has been appointed Attorney-General and the latter Solicitor-General. The other vacancies have not as yet been filled up, but the names of Messrs. Rolleston, Q.C., Armstrong, Q.C., and Andrews, Q.C., are spoken of for the serjeantcy; and Serjeant Sullivan, Messrs. Hemphill, Q.C., and Barry, Q.C., for the office of law adviser to the castle.

THE IRISH BENCH.

It has been stated that eight out of twelve of the Irish common law judges are Roman Catholics, (including two of the three chiefs)—viz., Chief Justice Monahan (the Chief Baron). Judges O'Brien, Fitzgerald, Ball, and Keogh, and Barons Hughes and Deasy. The new Attorney-General being also a Roman Catholic, it is not improbable that, ere long, the proportion will be increased to three-fourths instead of two-thirds.

MARITIME LAW.—SALVAGE.

On the 28th of May, 1860, a Prussian barque was caught in a fearful hurricane off the coast of Norfolk, and about 70 miles from the port of Great Yarmouth. The captain and four of the crew were washed overboard, and drowned. At 7 a. m. on the 29th of May, the vessel, which was then lying on her broadside with some of the crew still clinging to the wreck, was discovered by Captain Hubbard, the master of the smack "Gihon," of Yarmouth. At the most imminent peril to the lives of himself and crew, Captain Hubbard was enabled to save the lives of the survivors on the wreck. The sufferings of the men he had saved induced Captain Hubbard immediately afterwards to set sail for Yarmouth without attempting to take the barque in tow. The barque and cargo were of considerable value and were shortly afterwards picked up by other vessels and towed to Great Grimsby. Soon after the barque had been taken to that port a claim was made on behalf of the owner master and crew of the "Gihon," for life salvage, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The parties interested in the Prussian barque declined to pay the life salvage, and proceedings were instituted for its recovery. The cause recently came on for hearing before the Court of Admiralty, when the Court decided against the claim on the ground that the 458th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which provides for the recovery of life salvage, only extends to cases in which lives are saved within three miles from the shore of the United Kingdom. The case which we have mentioned shews that this section requires amendment.

Foreign Tribunals and Jurisprudence.

FRANCE.—A singular case was recently submitted to the President of the Civil Tribunal of Paris, sitting in chambers. Some time back a literary man named Ludovic was arrested and lodged in prison for the non-payment of a debt of 1,400*fr.* to a restaurateur. He had been cited as a witness before the Correctional Tribunal of Bordeaux in a case which was to be heard on the 31st of January last. By the administrative regulations the only way by which a prisoner can be conveyed from one place to another is by the gendarmerie, from brigade to brigade; but Ludovic represented that it was repugnant to him to be handed over to the gendarmerie as if he were a criminal. He therefore prayed that he might be sent to Bordeaux in custody of a garde-du-commerce, and he offered to pay the travelling expenses both of himself and the man. He also offered as full security to his creditor to deposit 2,000*fr.* in the hands of the garde-du-commerce, subject to the condition of the sum being restored on his being reinstalled in prison. But the President held that, as the law and regulations make no difference between a prisoner for debt and a criminal as to the manner in which they are to be conveyed from one place to another, the application could not be granted.

Reviews.

A Treatise on the Statutory Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, with an Appendix of Precedents. By WILLIAM WHITTAKER BARRY, of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-Law. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons. 1861.

The state of transition in which the jurisdiction and practice of courts of equity have been placed for some years past is strikingly exhibited in the attempts which have been made by text writers to adapt their books to the alterations during the period in question. One of the most remarkable features in the modern works on chancery practice is their departure generally from the old plan of a treatise; in which, under the former state of things, such writers as Nowland, Daniel, and Sidney Smith, exemplified the forms and procedure under which the Court exercised its jurisdiction. For some time after the modern statutes had effected a great revolution in its business, it was discovered that the form of a treatise, or of any systematic and complete work, was unsuitable for the embodiment of what was still very indefinite and unsettled. There was no doubt that much would be modified, if not entirely swept away, by enactments resulting from the experience gained in the working of the first few of the statutes to which we refer, and which were for a while regarded as somewhat tentative and empirical. Thus there sprang up a system of separate editions of each important Act affecting practice, and of grouping, merely according to the requirements of convenience, some Acts which had no other connection. We have also had books which although not affecting to give any complete account of the practice of the Court, included a considerable number or the whole of its General Orders, and of as many recent statutes of importance as practitioners might desire for their ordinary work. The author of the treatise now before us has pursued a middle course, between the manner of the old essayists or treatise writers and of the modern compilers and annotators. On the one hand, he avoids (except in the title of his book, which is hardly correct), every appearance of an attempt at an exhaustive treatment of the subject; and on the other, so far as he has gone, he has adopted the method of a treatise, and presents the information which he has to give, not in the form of mere notes referring to the statutory enactments, but rather in substantive propositions, embodying the effect of the statutes, and of decided cases. There can be no doubt that this form is very much the best for the purpose of those who want to make themselves generally acquainted with the procedure of the court. Mere notes tacked on to the statutes themselves, are certainly very convenient for use in court, or for reference pro hac vice; but it is impossible for a student to sit down and read such a work with any comfort; and, therefore, a book like the present was really a desideratum. At all events, nowhere else can be found so clear and intelligible an account in a substantive form of the Trustee Acts of 1850 and 1852, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, Sir George Turner's Act, the Trustee Relief Acts, the Infants Settlement and Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Acts, and other statutes under which the Court exercises its special jurisdiction. The construction of these various Acts, and their practical application, is pretty well settled by more than 1,000 reported cases, of which the Weekly Reporter (established in 1852, the year of the Chancery Amendment Acts and Orders) has been the largest contributor. What was wanting to systematize these numerous enactments and decisions, was a book which would not group them both in an arbitrary manner, but which would arrange and co-ordinate them according to their logical sequence. Mr. Barry has successfully attempted this task, and has produced an excellent book on chancery practice for students. One difficulty necessarily attended the exact execution of our author's design. The General Orders of the Court are so interwoven with the statutes conferring jurisdiction upon it, as to make a separate treatment of each extremely difficult. Mr. Barry, therefore, is obliged not unfrequently to refer to the Orders, and sometimes he does so where he was not compelled to do so; while he makes no reference whatever to them in other parts where any author would have introduced them, unless he was bound to exclude them by the design of his work. This is one inconvenience resulting from the restriction imposed by the title of this book. It is hard to define the class of subjects, or points of procedure, which are considered proper to be dealt with by the Legislature only, as distinguished from those which belong to the province of General Orders. In this respect there has been heretofore in truth no nice discrimination, and therefore there is something rather too arbitrary in a scientific treatise confining itself to what is thus, in a great measure, purely accidental. Unquestionably, some of the statutes included in this treatise have descended into comparatively trivial details, such as are usually prescribed by General Orders, while, on the other hand, many of the latter contain rules equally important and arbitrary as those enacted by Parliament. It is unnecessary to cite any illustrations of what we have just observed. So far the title of the work, if taken as indicating its proper scope and design, may fairly be considered as too narrow and restrictive; but also, as we have already intimated, it is open to the further charge of being too comprehensive, when viewed in the light of the author's performance. A book professing to treat of the statutory jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery which omits altogether the Acts of 1852, and the whole of the Winding-up Acts, is either wrongly entitled or very incomplete. The design of Mr. Barry was not to write a treatise upon the statutable jurisdiction of the Court, but upon certain important statutes by which the summary jurisdiction of the Court is greatly extended; and this he has done with care and ability; but yet we should not have felt ourselves justified in abstaining from offering the foregoing remarks upon the misleading title of the book before us.

Mr. Barry has added an appendix of precedents, which appear to have been judiciously selected. We doubt, however, the utility as a general rule of incumbering treatises with precedents. To persons accustomed to the practice of the Court, the precedents contained in this volume cannot be supposed to be of much use. Others, no doubt, may find them very convenient as guides; but Mr. Tripp's Chancery Forms appear to us to be all that such persons require; and we think, moreover, that practical forms and precedents ought to be material for a separate work, rather than of an appendix to every book on the subject to which they may appear to be relevant. The forms contained in Mr. Barry's appendix are well adapted to modern practice, and relate to a great number of different proceedings, and we would have no objection whatever to offer to them if they had not been made a part of his treatise.

The work contains a very complete table of contents and list of cases, and a very good general index.

Lectures Elementary and Familiar on the English Law. By JAMES FRANCILLON, Esq., County Court Judge. Second Series. London: Butterworths. 1861.

Last year we had an opportunity of expressing our entirely favourable opinion of the first series of Mr. Francillon's lectures. The volume then published contained 39 short lectures of a very elementary character, upon a large number of scattered heads of law. The volume now before us purports to be intended as the complement of our English system of jurisprudence. The object of the writer is to impart to a young student some general knowledge of the entire domain of our law, as a preparation for its more severe and elaborate study at some future time. The design of the work not merely encourages but in fact necessitates the most discursive treatment of the topics upon which it touches. It makes any thing like systematic plan or subjective sequence impossible; and it is hard, in such a book, to prevent subjects which require handling at length from assuming undue proportions when viewed in relation to the entire work. The student therefore must not expect to discover in these lectures any chart or map of the law of England, giving him a cursory view of its entire area and its main landmarks and subdivisions. But he will find in them a great deal of useful and reliable information, which, moreover, is imparted in a very agreeable manner. Although they do not go near exhausting the topics of English law, yet they neatly touch upon and illustrate very many of them sufficiently at all events to prompt the reader to further investigation for himself. Mr. Francillon is a pleasant writer and his notion of elementary law lectures is a happy one. He has got the knack of saying a little about a large subject without misleading his reader by a too absolute statement of propositions—which is one of the commonest faults of text writers who aim at generalization and simplicity. There is a temptation to state doctrines without indicating their endless modifications. From this Mr. Francillon has well escaped, and so far is a safe guide for beginners; to whom we recommend the perusal of his lectures as being not only instructive but entertaining.

The Law Magazine and Law Review for February, 1861. Butterworths.

The Law Magazine for this quarter contains a great variety of interesting matter. It opens with an article upon the trial of Lord Cochrane, in which it attributes the conviction of the renowned Sea-King very much to unintentional unfairness on the part of Lord Ellenborough. We have next a paper on common law pleading of the present day, founded principally upon the recent edition of Mr. Serjt. Stephen's treatise. There are also articles on the prospects of the Admiralty Court, the Bench and Bar of France, Mr. Hare's scheme for the reform of our Parliamentary representation, and other interesting subjects; together with several reviews of new law books, or new editions of old ones; nor must we forget to make special mention of a very interesting contribution towards the biography of the late Mr. Jarman. In the usual chapter on the events of the quarter, there is a vehement, and, in our opinion, a very disrespectful, attack upon the Lord Chancellor, for his recent observations on the practice of judges delivering oral judgments. The writer, who is very severe about what he terms the "bad taste" of the Chancellor, himself exhibits the worst possible taste in the expressions which he has made use of towards one who is not only in the distinguished position of being the head of the legal profession, but who is also unquestionably a great lawyer and most able judge. We have felt compelled by the respect which we owe both to the Lord Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor Wood, to abstain from any observations upon so delicate a subject as that of taste in reference to the question at issue; and the comments contained in the Law Magazine fully convince us of the propriety of the course which we adopted.

At the last moment before going to press we have received a printed paper containing a reply to certain strictures in this number of the Law Magazine, on Mr. MacLachlan's Treatise on the Law of Shipping. In observance of a rule well understood amongst journalists, we did not feel ourselves to be at liberty to criticise any of the reviews contained in the magazine. We are bound, however, to say that, upon further acquaintance with Mr. MacLachlan's work, we still entertain the high opinion of it, which we expressed in our review some months ago. Nothing stated by the reviewer in the Law Magazine induces us to reduce our estimate of the merits of the treatise in question; on the contrary, we think the writer in the Law Magazine has made only such a charge of plagiarism against Mr. MacLachlan as might be made against the writer of any large law book that ever was written, and such as there were no particular grounds for making against Mr. MacLachlan.

BIRMINGHAM LAW STUDENTS' SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of the Birmingham Law Students' Society was held on Friday evening, the 1st inst., at the Midland Institute. The Mayor (Arthur Ryland, Esq.) presided, and among the gentlemen present were Messrs. H. W. Tyndall, C. T. Saunders, G. J. Johnson, T. Horton, J. Marigold, C. E. Mathews, H. Neville, Swinden, Balden, J. Chirm, and others (solicitors), honorary members; Mr. Lilly Smith (honorary secretary), and a large number of ordinary members. The chief objects of the Society are the reading and discussing legal works, debating moot points, and accumulating a library; and its importance, especially to articulated clerks, may be estimated from the report of the committee, read by the honorary secretary, from which it appears, that although the Society has been in existence but little more than twelve years, it possesses a library of upwards of 400 volumes of valuable treatises and digests for the use of the ordinary members as well as for the honorary members, the latter of whom are barristers and solicitors of the town. The total number of members both honorary and ordinary is 175, and notwithstanding the number of members fluctuates from time to time by the draughting to London of those ripe for examination, the average number at least is sustained by the admission of new members. Among the ordinary members who passed their examination last year, the report notices the name of Mr. W. Septimus Harding, who obtained honorary distinction—a feature, as the committee observed, not new to their reports, which for several years past have had to record distinctions awarded to one or more of its members.

The fact that you are members of this society, devoted to the study of the principles and practice of the law, renders it unnecessary for me to say one word as to the importance either of the acquisition of such knowledge, or of the habit of study as distinguished from mere reading. Your society, I am happy to find, truly deserves its name of the Law Students' Society. I greatly admire your plan of taking the questions of the examiners, reading them one by one aloud, answering them vis à voce, and criticising the answers. In addition to this excellent practice, you discuss moot points. Your library of 400 well-selected volumes acquired in twelve years, is a testimony to the earnestness and wisdom of your predecessors and yourselves. I congratulate you on your possessing these means of knowledge, these incentives to study; and I congratulate our branch of the profession on the augury here afforded for its future reputation: and it is well for the town, too, for the welfare of every community is sensibly affected by the character of its practising solicitors. The few observations which I now address to you shall be directed to other matters than those which form the objects of your society, but which cannot be out of place to law students from one who has had thirty years' experience in the profession into which you are about to enter. I think it is as possible to spoil a Society as it is to spoil a child by praise and petting. I know it is by some considered the correct thing for a president at an annual meeting to devote his address to the glorification of the society. I could find much in your history and present state to justify such a course now, but I have too much regard for you to do so. A yearly repetition of such praises might lead some of your body to imagine that to be a studious and industrious member would insure his being a good lawyer—to look upon office work as drudgery unnecessary to be borne—and to hold cheap certain other qualities because they are not needed peculiarly in the professional man; against this silly blunder I desire to warn you. Be you sure that good and desirable, nay, essential, as is the possession of the knowledge to the acquisition of which you devote yourselves in this Society, such knowledge alone will not make you good lawyers. Much more is needed, and I will tell you what more I think is needed; and my observations and experience have taught me this, that successful lawyers have owed more to the qualities I am about to name than to their knowledge of law, essential although that is. And these qualities are—a habit of steady, persevering application to business; method in everything—in the smallest as the greatest thing—in action and in argument; ability to fix attention on details. This ability and these habits will best be gained by patient and faithful attention to office duties during clerkship. Many other reasons might be adduced why it is good we should bear this yoke in our youth. I warn you, for your own sakes, not to shirk what is called drudgery in the office. I would mention next, as one of the essentials of a good lawyer, the ability to express your thoughts in writing readily, accurately, clearly, and with brevity. The possession of this quality cannot be too earnestly desired. It can be acquired best by study and practice in youth. A knowledge of accounts and commercial mode of procedure is most valuable in our profession, but does not often receive the attention it deserves at the hands of clerks. I now come to qualities of a higher order; they are, a deep sense of responsibility, forgetfulness of our own immediate pecuniary interest, a calm temperament, courage, and an inviolable love of truth. It may be said, all this is very trite, why tell us what is so obvious? I will tell you why I do so; because I have seen so many failures from a disregard of some of these obviously good qualities. I have seen solicitors of first-rate ability and of great acquirements in legal lore, fail because they loved themselves better than their clients—because their love of gold was greater than their love of truth, than their sense of responsibility, or because their irascible temper was not under due control, or their want of courage occasioned a loss of opportunities. Let me put a case: A client desires to make his will. If you have a proper sense of your responsibility you will ascertain the condition of his family and connections in reference to their dependence upon him, and if his proposed disposition of his property is not in accordance with what you deem to be just, you will advise him accordingly; if he insist on doing what is wrong, you will, if you have courage and forgetfulness of your own immediate pecuniary benefit, you will refuse to make his will. I have referred to a will because I have found less vigilance in making a will by young attorneys than the importance of the occasion requires; but in numberless other cases the qualities to which I have referred should often lead a solicitor to interfere between the intentions and the acts of his clients. Better to lose a client than your own self-respect. How much of our business consists of negotiations; and what tells then? Is not the successful man he who has the calmest temper, the clearest method, and who is known never to depart from the truth, and never to be influenced by a love of personal gain? These qualities will prevent you being the servant of your client. He should be guided by you, not you by him. I have seen much done and bitterly repeated of because the attorneys were either afraid of losing their clients or had the bad habit of regarding themselves simply as their servants. The checking of wrong by preventing the angry passions of offended clients finding vengeance in litigation, by averting unrighteous wills, by refusing to recognise an untrue statement, even if the end proposed to be gained thereby appear to be good—this we may daily do; this we ought never to omit to do; and if we cultivate the qualities I have referred to we shall do. These qualities require cultivation. A man naturally indecisive may, by constant self-watchfulness and self-discipline, become decisive; the irascible and excitable self-controlled and patient; and the careless methodical. The hardest thing to do is to check the love of money, yet this is one of the most important; but this may be done in early life. One word, and I will conclude. Let me warn you against a habit which besets a young lawyer, and if yielded to will interfere with his success quite as much as a want of book-knowledge—a juggling dexterity, cunning, or smartness. It has been well observed in a book I recommend to your study, “Essays Written during Intervals of Business,” “That the proper use of dexterity is to prevent you being circumvented by the cunning of others. It should not be aggressive.” A cunning lawyer is disliked by everyone, except by those dishonest people who wish to use him. When you have lived as long as I have, you will find that one rule, which you learned as children, will guide you in determining your advice to your clients. Do not think what will please them, what will secure them as clients, what will put most money into your pockets; but advise them to do that which, if in their position and with your knowledge, you would yourself do—in other words, follow our Saviour's golden rule, “Do unto others as you would have others do unto you.”

An enthusiastic vote of thanks was awarded to the chairman for his great kindness in the chair, and for his excellent and valuable address.

To Landowners, the Clergy, Solicitors, Estate Agents, Surveyors, &c.

THE LANDS IMPROVEMENT COMPANY is incorporated by special Act of Parliament for England, Wales, and Scotland. Under the Company's Acts, tenants for life, trustees, mortgagees in possession, incumbents of livings, bodies corporate, certain leasees, and other landowners, are empowered to charge the inheritance with the cost of improvements, whether the money be borrowed from the Company, or advanced by the landowner out of his own funds.

The Company advance money, unlimited in amount, for works of land improvement, the loans and incidental expenses being liquidated by a rent-charge for a specified term of years.

No investigation of title is required, and the Company, being of a strictly commercial character, do not interfere with the plans and execution of the works, which are controlled only by the Enclosure Commissioners.

The improvements authorised comprise drainage, irrigation, warping, embanking, enclosing, clearing, reclaiming, planting, erecting, and improving farm-houses, and buildings for farm purposes, farm roads, jetties, steam-engines, water-wheels, tanks, pipes, &c.

Owners in fee may effect improvements on their estates without incurring the expense and personal responsibilities incident to mortgages, and without regard to the amount of existing incumbrances. Proprietors may apply jointly for the execution of improvements mutually beneficial, such as a common outfall, roads through the district, water-power, &c.

For further information, and for forms of application, apply to the Hon. WILLIAM NAPIER, Managing Director, 2, Old Palace-yard, Westminster.

CURRENT TOPICS.

It was explained at the time when the present arrangements respecting Statute Law reform were made, that the primary object in view was the preparation of an edition of the statutes, containing only Acts in force, and omitting those of a local or personal nature. The Statute Law Revision Bill, re-introduced by the Lord Chancellor on Monday evening, purports to be auxiliary to the work of editing. It proposes to repeal, expressly and specifically, a very large number of enactments which have ceased to be in force, either by being repealed in general terms, or virtually repealed, or superseded; and it appears from the preamble that this course is adopted with a view to the revision of the statute law, and particularly to the preparation of a revised or expurgated edition. The usefulness of such a work is unquestionable, and it is one which could not be accomplished except under the authority of the Government, and by the means which are at the disposal of it alone. One great advantage of such a repealing Bill is, that when the work of examination is once done, its results are authoritatively recorded, by the direct action of the Legislature, for all time to come. Future expurgators will not have to search and investigate for themselves; they will be saved the labour of going again over the ground which has been once swept clear.

The present Bill, which is the work of Messrs. Reilly and Wood, relates to a period of nearly a century, extending backwards from the present time. We have reason to believe that another Bill on the like plan is in preparation, and will shortly be introduced, dealing with the early statutes, and extending over several reigns; and that some portion of the first volume of the revised edition is, in fact, in type, and will receive its final shape on the expurgating Bill being adopted by Parliament.

The New Bankruptcy Bill is an improvement on the Government Bill of last session in all respects save one. It is not a consolidating measure, and is, so far, inferior. But the experience of last session showed the difficulty of passing a consolidating and amending Bill through the House. Therefore, perhaps, the Attorney-General has done wisely in making it simply a measure of amendment. The expense which it is proposed to entail on the country is very much less now than it was last year; and the burden on creditors also is diminished by a reduction of fees. The new Bill avoids the error of restricting the jurisdiction of the County Courts, and in respect to the winding-up of the estate, the creditors are left free to follow their own devices, whether to retain the official assignee, or to employ one or more of the creditors as assignee, or to appoint a committee of creditors, with a manager as their agent, after the exact pattern of the Scotch system. It may, perhaps, be doubted whether it is wise to vest all the functions of the creditors in the hands of a majority of value of that body. But even if it be wise to do so with regard to the choice of assignees, it is certainly inexpedient and somewhat unreasonable to do so with regard to the transfer to a county court; for the very object of a transfer to a county court is to accommodate the body of creditors as to locality, and not to give to a few creditors, or it may be to one large creditor, the power of inconveniencing all the rest. In this case the decision should be by a majority in number and value.

The trust deed clauses of the new Bill are satisfactory. Those relating to the administration of the estates of deceased debtors are meagre; but probably as much as can be passed. The clauses making the courts in Scotland, Ireland, and the colonies, auxiliary, are, we believe, new and would be most beneficial.

We observe in the schedule to the new Chancery Order that an Examiner of the Court who is taken into the country for the purpose of the examination or cross-examination of any witness, is to be allowed for every mile which the examiner travels from London to the place of examination and back the sum of one shilling and sixpence. This is the same allowance as that fixed by the order of 8th May, 1845. In that Order the fact that the allowance was exorbitant was comparatively harmless, inasmuch as country examinations were very rare. Under the new general Order it is not improbable that they will become frequent, unless they are prevented by considerations of expense; but according to the present scale the mere travelling expenses of an examiner going to and returning from Liverpool would amount to not less than the sum of £31 1s.

We noticed some weeks ago that an attempt was being made to throw open the prosecutions of offenders committed by the Leeds Borough Magistrates to the profession generally, instead of allowing them to be conducted exclusively by two gentlemen appointed fifteen or sixteen years ago by the Town Council as public prosecutors. The subject was referred to a committee of the council which, on the 13th inst., reported as follows:—"That this committee approve of the principle of the employment of public prosecutors, and are of opinion that the ends of public justice would be best served by the appointment of such officers, but recommend to the Council that the present appointments be rescinded from and after such time as the Council may deem expedient, and that the future appointments to these offices be not permanent, but rotatory, and continue in force for twelve months only; the parties appointed being required to conduct such prosecutions for the county allowance. That the justices be recommended in all special or important cases, where it is considered expedient for the ends of public justice so to do, to bind over the party aggrieved to prosecute at either the sessions or assizes, as the case may be."

It was thereupon moved that the report be adopted, and that the committee be authorised to carry it out, and report to the council; and a resolution to that effect was, after some discussion, carried unanimously. The gentleman who moved the adoption of the report explained that the system which its framers contemplated was that the public prosecutors should conduct all cases, excepting those which might seem so important to the magistrates as to induce them to bind over the party aggrieved to prosecute, instead of binding over a policeman, and that such exceptional cases should be conducted by the prosecutor's own attorney. Instead, moreover, of the office of public prosecutor being a permanent one, it would only be held for a year by each occupant, who would be selected by lot from those attorneys practising within the borough, who were able and willing to take it. If the town council and the magistrates insist on interfering with the conduct of prosecutions which they appear to have no right to do, the arrangement suggested by the committee appears to be as little open to objection as any that could be made. The main ground alleged for assuming the right is, that if the party aggrieved were left free in every case to choose his own attorney, there might be touting for prosecutions on the part of some attorneys who do not stand high in the profession. So far as Leeds is concerned, however, we believe that this apprehension is unfounded, and even if it were not we object, on principle, to the doing of evil that good may come. The Town Council of a borough has no more right to appoint a public prosecutor than has the parish vestry or the board of guardians, nor have the magistrates any right to say to the real prosecutor, "You shall not prosecute, but we will bind over one of the police to do so." If the present system of prosecuting offenders requires amendment, let the Legislature interfere, but in the meantime corporations and magistrates ought not to exceed their powers on the mere ground of expediency.

TAXATION OF SUITORS.—No. V.—LAW TAXES.—LEGAL FINANCE.—COURTS OF JUSTICE AS BANKERS.

Having mapped out the subject of the Taxation of Sutors we proceed to that of Legal Finance.

All the courts of justice have more or less to act as bankers or stakeholders for suitors. In contentious suits money is often paid into court on pleas of tender and the like, or by way of bail or security. In administration business such payments amount to very large sums; witness the fifty and odd millions under the care of the Court of Chancery. The common law courts are now vested with extensive equitable jurisdiction, the right use of which will be learned in a generation or two, and will involve the conduct of very large banking transactions under their orders. In the first article of our present series we indicated the questions which were involved in considering courts of justice as bankers; but before proceeding to discuss those questions it will be well to inquire somewhat into the statistics of the subject, and to point out what are the existing modes of providing for the safe custody of the monies and funds of the suitors in the several courts of the kingdom. For the present we shall confine ourselves to the Courts of Chancery, Common Law, and Admiralty.

1. As to the COURT OF CHANCERY:—

Previously to 1725 all monies of the suitors directed to be brought into the Court of Chancery were deposited with the masters or usher of that court. The interest made by them on such monies as had to remain uninvested formed a most important part of their emoluments. It appears by the evidence given in the very interesting trial of Lord Chancellor Macclesfield in that year, as reported in the State Trials, that the price or bribe at which the Lord Chancellor of those days sold each Master's appointment depended upon the amount of suitors' cash deposited in the particular office then vacant. The evidence shows that the masters deposited large portions of these monies with the goldsmiths to be lent at interest; but the South Sea Bubble which had occurred at that time having caused many of these goldsmiths to fail, the masters were unable to repay to the suitors the monies so deposited with them,* and the deficiency, which amounted to upwards of £100,000, had to be made good to the suitors by the produce of a tax imposed by the Act of 12 George 1, c. 33, on future suitors not only in Chancery, but in all other courts of justice in England and Wales.

To obviate such mishaps in future, it was determined to appoint an Accountant-General, and in 1726, the Act of 12 Geo. 1, c. 32, was passed, regulating the modes of providing for the safe custody of all monies of the chancery suitors paid into court. This Act, though it provided with sufficient care for the safe custody of the suitors' future monies, yet clogged the mode of paying in and paying out such monies, and of selling and purchasing stock, with many cumbersome and expensive proceedings and dilatory checks: these it is hoped will be removed or diminished by the commission which it is rumoured is about to be issued for the long-desired inquiry into the mode of transacting the business of the suitors in the Accountant-General's office, and of dealing with the suitors' funds.

Neither the last-mentioned Act of Parliament, nor any subsequent one, has established that kind of financial supervision which any banker or financier would exercise over funds placed under his control. But this observation belongs to an after part of our subject.

The Court of Chancery, as a banker, has now in stock and cash upwards of fifty millions of suitors' property in its hands. By arrangement with the Bank of England, £300,000 cash is the amount of cash balance to be kept for the bank remuneration; but at this moment we believe it to be upwards of a million, upon no part of which are the suitors allowed any interest; and yet the present rate of discount is 7 or 8 per cent.

Another account (which may be called an account of "waifs and estrays") still remains to be mentioned, and (looking at the small amounts from which it has been gathered together) its existence affords another proof of the utter incapacity of the present system to deal properly with suitors' monies.

Every chancery suitor appealing to the Court of Appeal in Chancery from a decree of the Master of the Rolls or a Vice-Chancellor, is required to make a deposit of £20, and this sum was up to 1852 deposited with the senior registrar of that Court. In consequence of the neglect of the successful suitor on the termination of such appeal to apply for payment to him of such deposit, a large amount had been accumulated, which rumour assigns as having been invested by the senior registrar in the purchase of £10,000 Stock, the interest whereof was received by him, and appropriated to his own use; and this course had been considered perfectly legitimate so long as he was able to replace the amount so invested when demanded by the suitors. In 1852, the amount of such stock, and of the cash in the hands of the senior registrar arising from these deposits, was, pursuant to Lord St. Leonards' Act of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 41, transferred and paid into the Bank of England, to the credit of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, to an account entitled, "The Appeal Deposit Account;" and all future deposits have, pursuant to the same Act, been paid to the senior registrar, and by him paid into the same account every three months. The 41st section of the same Act directed that "the monies which shall from time to time be standing to such account, shall be paid and applied as the Court of Chancery shall from time to time in that behalf direct." But it is believed this authority has never been exercised, and that the interest which has since 1852 accrued on the stock so transferred into court in that year, has remained idle on this account, and has not been applied for the benefit of the suitor.

2. As to Courts of COMMON LAW.

All monies paid into the Court of Queen's Bench by the suitors are deposited at the private bankers of the Masters of that Court, for the time being—a course not dissimilar to that which prevailed in Chancery previously to 1725, when it was attended by the disastrous results before mentioned. It appears at p. 125 of the Report of 1860 of the Commission on the Concentration of the Courts of Justice, that the cash balance of suitors' funds then in the several Courts of Common Law was £37,023 7s. 3d.; viz.:—

Queen's Bench	15,482	7	10
Common Pleas	10,227	8	7
Exchequer of Pleas	11,313	10	10

What security for the repayment of these monies so deposited the suitors have, we know not.

In a report of the select committee of the House of Commons on Sinecure Offices in 1834 (printed 25th July, 1834, and cited in the evidence in the Report of the Commission on the Concentration of the Courts,

* In the celebrated picture of the South Sea Bubble in the Vernon Gallery, a Master in Chancery with a bag labelled "Chancery Sutors' Monies," has been unaccountably omitted.

p. 91), the question of Lord Ellenborough's right as chief clerk of the King's Bench, to the interest on monies paid into court, and placed in his hands as chief clerk, is fully discussed. Lord Ellenborough claimed that, as he was bound to pay out the sum to a certain point, any interest he might make belonged to him as his perquisite; but the committee stated that they conceived that this interest should be dealt with "as money held in trust for the public."

3. As to the ADMIRALTY COURT.

It is only a few years since (1853), the newspapers announced that the then Registrar of the Court (Mr. Swabey) had decamped with a large amount of the suitors' monies—and in the Appropriation Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 121, s. 23, authority is given to issue out of the consolidated fund "any sum or sums of money not exceeding £25,000, to enable the Registrar of the Court of Admiralty to discharge the legal claims of the suitors of the said court in the year ending 31st March, 1855." The money paid into the Court of Admiralty continues to be paid to the registrar, but to guard against any similar occurrence it is stated by the present registrar in his evidence before the Concentration of Courts Commission (report, p. 77) that soon after his appointment in 1853 the Treasury made an order that the account to his credit at the Bank of England to meet current expenses should not exceed £5,000, and that the excess beyond that sum should be paid over to the Paymaster-General, and be held by him to the credit of the Admiralty Court deposit account, so that the Government might have the use of the balances. We consider, however, any use and profit by the Government of these monies wholly wrong, and that so long as any special tax is imposed on the suitors towards the maintenance of the Court, they are entitled to this profit in reduction of such special tax.

All monies so deposited by the suitors in either of these courts remain dormant, and do not fructify and bear interest for the benefit of the parties entitled thereto, as monies do which are deposited by prudent individuals in a savings bank, and this we hope will be rectified by the rumoured Commission. It is an admitted fact that no suitor willingly pays his own money into any court, and the greater portion of the funds in the Court of Chancery have been paid in either by trustees, or by purchasers of estates sold by that court, and it appears very hard that money so paid in—whether it is ultimately adjudged to belong to the person paying it in, or to others—should remain in an unproductive state. In reply to this it will be said "it should have been invested;" but where? considering that Consols were until the present month the usual investment authorized by the Court of Chancery. Such investment in Consols is all very well when it is certain it will remain in court during a course of litigation for a considerable period; but inasmuch as the average duration of suits in chancery is but three years and half, and a great part of the monies paid into the Court of Chancery (of which the larger portion consists of the parliamentary deposits of promoters of public undertakings) are paid out within six months, it is obvious, considering the chance of the fluctuation of the funds, that it would be most imprudent and improvident to make any such investment for so short a period.* The average weekly balance of the chancery suitors' cash in the Bank of England from 13th January, 1859, to 15th August, 1859, was upwards of £1,000,000, of which more than half-a-million probably arose from such parliamentary deposits, and from January, 1846, to July in 1846, such cash deposits averaged upwards of eight millions cash. When any one happens to have a larger balance at his bankers than he has immediate occasion for, or any client of a solicitor has money waiting to complete a purchase, he does not allow it to remain unproductive, but places it at one of the joint stock banks on a deposit account; and either a similar system, or the system proposed in the New Post Office Savings' Bank Bill, whereby a certain even though small rate of interest may be allowed for each entire calendar month, on every full pound sterling of suitors' cash so deposited, we hope to see recommended by the members of the rumoured Commission.

In our next article we intend to point out the banking or financial statistics of the bankruptcy and insolvent courts, and of the county and some local courts, and perhaps of the Irish Court of Chancery.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS BY MARRIED WOMEN—3 & 4 WILL. 4, c. 74, s. 91.*

Upon this section a question has arisen, whether a deed executed pursuant to an order made under it requires acknowledgment or not. As in this question, which has been gravely entertained, every "perpetual commissioner" will, of course, feel an interest, we propose to consider it somewhat at large. In the absence of authority to the contrary, we should have thought it pretty clear that the wife must acknowledge the deed. Her only ability is created by s. 77, which clogs it with two essential requisites:—1. The concurrence of the husband; 2. The acknowledgment of the wife. These conditions fulfilled, her disposition is to have the same efficacy as if she were a feme sole, i.e., for all the purposes of the transaction which is the subject-matter of the deed; or, more accurately speaking, for the purposes of that transaction, so far as they are embraced by the contents and incidents of the deed, she is, but only on the terms prescribed, declared to be discover. By s. 79 every deed to be executed by a married woman, for any of the purposes of the Act (with an immaterial exception) is, upon her executing the same or afterwards, required to be produced and acknowledged by her as her act and deed; and then s. 80 directs an examination as to free volition before the acknowledgment by any married woman of any deed made under the Act shall be received, and declares, by the awkward and superfluous tail-piece "and in such case, &c.," (i.e. literally the case of her not being permitted to acknowledge), or means to declare (or reiterate) that her execution of the deed, unless or until acknowledged, shall go for nothing; or it may be meant (though not quite consistently with the "or afterwards," i.e., at any future time, of s. 79), that a refusal of permission to acknowledge shall render the execution incapable of acknowledgment—a strange and inconvenient result. Thus all deeds of all married women, so far as any extraordinary force is given by the Act, must have the requisites of the husband's concurrence and of the wife's acknowledgment, while the means of complying with this last requisite are withheld until a certain ceremony has been gone through. But by s. 91 the first requisite (the husband's concurrence) is struck out in certain exceptional cases. That section empowers the Court of Common Pleas (most unwisely entrusted with such a discretion, having regard to its ordinary functions and to its ancient fine-and-recovery predilections), under special circumstances attending the husband, to dispense by its order with his concurrence "in any case in which his concurrence is required by this Act or otherwise," but not, in terms at least, with any other requisite of the Act, and the section then proceeds to declare that all acts of the wife done "in pursuance of such order," (i.e., an order dispensing with the husband's concurrence) shall be done "in the same manner as if she were a feme sole," and when done shall be as valid as "if the husband had concurred." Now the question is, whether the act may be done by an unacknowledged deed? This section supposes a "case" within the general purview of the Act—a case contemplated and provided for by the previous enactments relating to the dispositions of married women: it qualifies those enactments by engrafting a dispensing power. It is not a simple, substantive enactment, enabling a married woman, if the Court of Common Pleas shall think fit to make an order dispensing with her husband's concurrence in a particular act, to do that act irrespectively of all that has gone before in the same statute—to do that act as "by her own recovered might" not only with all the legal effect of a single-woman's deed, but with all the personal volition of a single-woman. The ambiguity (for ambiguity there is) appears to be mainly created by the words "shall be done by her, &c., in the same manner as if she were a feme sole," but these words must be construed with a due regard, as well to the concluding member of the same clause, "and when (so) done, &c., shall (but without prejudice to the rights of the husband, &c.,) be as good and valid as they would have been if the husband had concurred," as to the previous context, and to all the preceding provisions in relation to the married proprietress, and, so construed, can hardly be taken to import, as respects the particular act, not qualified competency, but absolute emancipation. Those equivocal clauses "and all acts, &c., shall be done by her in the same manner as if she were a feme sole, &c.,"—"and when done, &c.," laid together, seem to purport nothing more than "and all acts, &c., may, notwithstanding any of the previous enactments, be done by her without the concurrence of her husband, as effectually as if the husband had concurred." The Legislature could not well have intened an imperative mandate on the feme to assume the free agency of discovery. This section is part of a general scheme, not an isolated provision; "the acts, deeds, or surrenders" are such "acts, deeds, or surrenders," only as fall within the previous sections, omitting the one ingredient of the husband's concurrence. The larger construction would ignore s. 77; the assurance would not necessarily be an instrument under seal (a deed); yet this section (91) starts by putting the case of a husband "incapable of executing a deed or of making a surrender of lands held by copy of court roll," being the two forms of assurance to which the antecedent enactments as to married women confine the exercise of her disposing power. This section, therefore, was hung on to these enactments as a rider, not as an over-rider. This would have been plain enough (omitting the "or otherwise") but for the superadded clause "and all acts, &c.," which is really nothing more than the confusion of a cloudy mind labouring to clear itself, till the first faint glimpse of meaning vanishes in the fog of elucidation. It may be urged that where the husband is not a party, and where the Court grants the wife's application, a separate examination, which must precede the acknowledgment, is an idle ceremony; but may not the deed be in favour of the husband or the husband's relative, and, though he may be far away, yet induced by past menaces, or by the coercion of a telegram? The state of circumstances which existed at the date of the order may have changed. It must be confessed that this section is confused in matter and form—"the latter end of the Commonwealth forgets the beginning." We more than suspect that it is not the handy-work of the very able, candid, conscientious, and, we fear, it may be added, ill-requited planner of the substitute law and framer of its principal provisions; for (with its "or shall from any cause be incapable, &c.,"—"or from any other cause whatsoever,"—"or otherwise,"—"and all acts, &c.,"—"and when done, &c.," its general incoherency, superfluity, and even grammatical inaccuracy) it savours strongly of the ingenuity which enacted that a contingent remainder shall be an executory devise or use, or (to use the sarcasm of the present Lord Chancellor, in speaking of the now repealed enactment) "that a square shall be a circle." It was inevitable that out of a scheme so elaborate and untried, provisions so numerous and complex, (deranged, mutilated, and interpolated by the necessity of coaxing obstinate prejudices, quieting crotchety fears, sopping the many-headed guardian of the ancient mysteries, and running a race with official impatience) a host of questions should arise to perplex the practitioner, especially in regard to the new conservative office of protector. These questions are floating about in the profession and ought speedily to be set at rest. With the lights now afforded by many years' experience, the Act should be forthwith reviewed, retrenched, reconciled, explained—in short, reconstructed on the same basis, with improvements suggested by its past working, and, yet more urgently, by an advanced period of our judicial policy, by the decay of old attachments and the growth of new desires. Among other improvements the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas in these matters should be transferred to the Court of Chancery, or rather (as the business must be inconsiderable) to one of its branches—enrolment and acknowledgment should go together. We shall hardly have credence for the statement that the Rules of the Common Pleas were prepared and adopted without the aid or approval of the experienced framer of the Act and not without some discourtesy. We may add, that the highest bid, as we are informed, yet made for an amended Bill (affecting the "wealth of nations" and the well-being of millions) is somewhere about the fee of a leading counsel on a brief of no extraordinary bulk or specialty. With a figure just a trifle higher, an inaugural dinner, a modest share of the credit, and the whole onus of faults and slips, there would be nothing wanting to induce an efficient hand to do this needful national work, for its own dear sake, but—leisure, love, and patriotism. It has been said, that "The tampering world is subject to this curse, To physic its disease into a worse;"

and certainly there is no patient on whom that curse has fallen more grievously than the Law, which, by gratuitous nostrums and cheap remedies, as shown by the large amount of unpaid or ill-paid doctors' Bills, has been brought into a state of chronic dyspepsia. While the individual citizen is prescribed for, the body-politic is quacked.

MOSE'S CASE.

Satirists and dramatists have never been sparing of the law or lawyers. In all countries, so far as civilization extends, the profession of the law and its processes must, in the nature of things, become identified with a class of cases which reflect little credit upon either, and which powerfully enlist the sympathies, if not the passions, of our common nature against both. The misfortune is that one such case is more than enough with the unthinking multitude to balance all that is of honest and good report which may be set upon the other side. However this may be, lawyers, more than all other men, have certainly the deepest interest in probing these causes of scandal, and dragging into the light of day whatever of such injustice and wrong would seek to shelter itself at the expense of the entire profession and of the law itself.

A few days ago, the inhabitants of the quiet university town of Cambridge were shocked beyond measure by the occurrence of a tragical and lamentable event. On the morning of last Sunday week it became known that a Mr. John Bailey, a highly respected tradesman of the town, had committed suicide; and the rumour ran that he was driven to this dreadful act by his want of success and bitter disappointment in a Chancery suit. Extraordinary and unlikely as was the reason assigned, its truth was proved beyond doubt at an inquest which was held on the following day, before the Borough Coroner and a jury of towns people. The verdict was, that "the deceased shot himself while in a state of temporary insanity, which was induced by the litigation relating to the matter of Alfred Mose." The facts which transpired, although not nearly so definite and satisfactory as might have been expected in such a case, enable us to give some slender account of this unhappy suit. It appears that Mose, the person named in the verdict of the jury, has been long known in his neighbourhood as a claimant for considerable real estate, consisting mainly of houses in Reading. For many years Mose's case had been spoken of in the neighbourhood, and was fast becoming one of the local myths, when Bailey, most unhappily for himself, was induced to mix himself up with it. An agreement was entered into, under which Bailey was to receive "half the clear profits" arising from the successful prosecution "of the case;" and thereupon he immediately devoted himself to his miserable and hopeless task. Mose some years before had been a bankrupt, and the creditors' assignee of his estate and effects having died, it became necessary to have a new assignee named before the institution of legal proceedings, and Bailey for this purpose had himself appointed. Having thus acquired a legal status and a right to file a bill in Chancery against the parties in possession of the estate, that first step was unhappily taken. Of what passed between this and the catastrophe which abates the suit, little was stated at the inquest beyond the fact that Bailey had paid to his lawyers not less than £170, in full expectation of the success of his suit, and that very shortly before his death he received a letter from them to the effect "that it would be better to dismiss the bill, and that he would have to pay costs." Having been assured "when he first took up the case that he would have nothing to pay, and that the other parties would have all to pay," he was unable to stand this blow, which not only crushed his hopes of success in the suit, but overwhelmed his little business and good name with bankruptcy and disgrace.

Now, although the evidence as to the suit adduced upon the inquest was by no means complete, yet there was sufficient to yield serious grounds for reflection upon the duty of lawyers in connection with such cases as Mose's. It came out that there was a letter to Mose from Mr. Kenneth Macaulay, written three years before the commencement of Bailey's suit; and from this it appeared that Mr. Macaulay, who was then as now member for the borough, had himself, with a generosity and in a manner worthy of his high character, investigated the claim of Mose, "which he could not see any gleam of a chance of establishing—even if Mose was in a condition to follow up the matter with vigour." It also appeared that Mose was at that time actually in prison for non-payment of costs which he had incurred in another Chancery suit relating to the same matter—which costs Mr. Macaulay ultimately paid; and indeed it was quite notorious that Mr. Macaulay was not the only competent person who, yielding to the earnest solicitations of Mose, had investigated his case, and arrived at an opinion entirely unfavourable to him. It is stated that this fact was not only well known in the locality of Mose's residence, but that it was explicitly communicated to the legal advisers who instituted the suit in which unfortunate Bailey was plaintiff. It is also said that the former suit included as a defendant a clergyman of the highest reputation, who was nevertheless expressly charged with being party, together with the other defendants, to a conspiracy which, if the charge was true, was of the vilest and most outrageous character; but which was most positively denied by the clergyman and his co-defendants, and indeed seems to have been made without any justification or reasonable pretence. It has been stated, and it appears not unlikely, that all these circumstances were in the knowledge of the legal advisers of Bailey prior to the institution of his suit; and although an answer to his bill had been put in yet that it conveyed no information which could not have easily been obtained by private inquiry, or which justified the relinquishment of the suit if there had been anything to justify its institution. It is no wonder then that both the coroner, who was himself a lawyer, and the jury, amongst whom Bailey seems to have stood in the highest repute, should have expressed themselves indignantly at the conduct of Bailey's legal advisers; and without at all venturing to decide upon this question, with our present scanty materials, we find it difficult to avoid participating in the foregone conclusion of those who were present at the inquest. Upon this point, however, it is not unlikely that we may before long have better grounds upon which to form our opinion. For the present we desire to call attention to the case for the sake of the lessons which it affords, and also because we ought not to omit the occasion of insisting, in the most emphatic terms, that neither lawyers, nor the law itself, should be visited with any of the odium arising from such a case as we have been considering. The processes of law may, no doubt, be abused by unscrupulous persons, and in such hands may be made instruments of torture. But, happily, there is far more difficulty in procuring in our profession agents for this purpose, than the public generally is willing to believe.

It is, moreover, a salutary reflection that all persons actively engaged, whether as principals or agents, in such proceedings, expose themselves as a rule to the risk of as much vexation and suffering as the luckless objects of their litigious propensity; and although in such a case the lawyer may appear to occupy a position of comparative immunity, in truth he is liable to the loss, not only of his money, but of his character. The law has wisely discountenanced the trade of litigation, and looks with aversion upon arrangements to carry on suits for the benefit of strangers who supply the sinews of war; and one useful lesson to be drawn from this sad story is the folly of any lawyer who endeavours to countervail the policy of the law in this respect, by lending himself to the prosecution of such suits. There are few practitioners who have not been often earnestly solicited to take up some such "case" as that of Mose. Everybody knows some madman or schemer who thinks or pretends he is entitled to estates, of the possession of which he is—according to the judgment of common sense—deprived by the rightful owner. Fortunately for the good of society, and the character of our profession, it is generally a matter of some difficulty to find a lawyer who is willing to be identified with these cases; and it would have been lucky for luckless Bailey if that first obstacle had been more difficult than it appears to have been in his case.

We are compelled to hold over until next week an article upon the recent examination of articled clerks, and also some articles upon other subjects.

LIABILITIES BY SPECIALTY AND BY SIMPLE CONTRACT.—INCONVENIENCES OF THIS DISTINCTION BETWEEN CONTRACTS.

II.

The account which we gave, in the former paper* on this subject, of the probable origin of sealed documents, and of their introduction and effect in the early stages of our law, goes far, we think, to show that covenants at that period had seldom any independent existence, but were merely incidental to a conveyance. Where there was a conveyance by feoffment or grant, there might or might not also be covenants; but covenants, it would appear, were hardly ever entered into at that time, except as subsidiary to an actual conveyance. Now deeds were used only to pass estates in land, and hence we can find a reason why covenants, when they became a frequent form of contract, did not at common law bind estates in land after the death of the covenantor, unless the covenant, like a conveyance, contained the word "heirs." In the first stages of our law, the courts preferred accommodating the existing writs and forms of action to inventing new ones. Covenants, it appears, were but little, if at all, known to our commercial law under the feudal régime; but as such forms of contract were the only ones then in frequent use, as comprising those causes of action which alone could arise generally throughout the kingdom when land was the staple of wealth, a necessity arising from the predilection for established forms which then prevailed, would seem to have existed for permitting an action of covenant to be brought in the centres of commerce, although the agreement was not entered into by deed. Accordingly, we find that by the custom of London and of other localities, an action of covenant might have been brought under an agreement by parol (1 Lev. 2). These customs, however, as contravening the general rule of law, are construed strictly; so that an executor is not chargeable under such. To the customs of commerce, then, which do not brook delay or intricacy of rights, we are indebted for the first inroad upon the forms of contract specially favoured by the common law. Equity, likewise, lent her plastic hand in correcting the technical analogies to which the doctrines relating to specialties gave rise. Positive legislation has, also, been applied to level the distinctions between contracts, both expressly, as, for instance, in cases of bankruptcy, as also indirectly, as in the case of the Winding-up Acts. It has been determined that under one of the latter Acts, a call transmutes and levels all securities to the order of simple contract. We shall now endeavour to detail some of the inconveniences which have been occasioned by the distinction of liabilities into those raised by simple contract and those raised by parol. From a consideration of these inconveniences it will, we think, be manifest that the complete eradication of the distinction is the only remedy in any degree adequate to the evil.

The inconveniences of the distinction of debts into different classes, each having its peculiar rights, are very clearly shown by the order which an executor or administrator must observe in the payment of the debts of the deceased whom he represents. In the preceding paper on this subject, we stated that the priority of judgments in administration cases did not conflict with the reasons which appear to us to require the abolition of the existing distinction between debts not of record; inasmuch as judgments are matter of process. We do not desire to balk an active creditor, whose contract no longer rests in feri: vigilantibus non dormientibus subveniunt leges. To judgments, then, we gladly yield their present priority, especially as Lord St. Leonards' Act of last session has revived the security afforded to executors by the statute 5 W. & M., c. 20, the Docketing Act. The only suggestion we offer in connection with this priority is, that rent, which is at present merely of the order of a debt by specialty, should be constituted of equal rank with debt by judgment. We would, also, suggest that statutes and recognizances should be rendered co-ordinate with judgments, only that, as the former have become somewhat obsolete, we do not wish to see legal transactions complicated by the use of different kinds of debts or obligations of record. We, therefore, think that the complete removal of statutes and recognizances from all legal transactions in future, and the substitution of judgments in all cases for those antiquated securities, would so far tend to prevent unnecessary complication.

We may here briefly state the order to be observed in the administration of assets. First in order are crown debts; then, judgments; next, statutes and recognizances; and this order is to be observed whether the assets are legal or equitable. So far as the assets are equitable (and real estate can alone constitute equitable assets), all specialty and simple contract debts are paid pari passu. As to legal assets, the specialty debts of the deceased, whether binding the heir or not, are paid pari passu out of the personal estate, Wms. Pers. Pr. 97, but preferentially to debts by simple contract, ib. p. 100. Specialty debts binding the heir should be paid before those not binding the heir out of real assets, out of which the latter class of specialties and debts by simple contract are paid pari passu. To the class of specialty debts belong debts by obligation, debts by covenant, whether for a sum certain, or for damages on a breach of covenant; and debts for rent, whether the land for which the rent is due be held under lease by deed, or merely by parol.

These four kinds of debts are of the same degree, Plumer v. Merchant, 3 Burr. 1380, Gage v. Acton, 1 Salk. 826. But in the administration of the separate estate of a married woman a bond debt is not entitled to this rank, because as a bond it is void; the debt secured by it is therefore only of the order of simple contract, Anon. 18 Ves. 258. An executor is also bound to pay a debt by specialty as on a bond, even though it be not yet due, in priority to debts by simple contract; the obligation being a present duty, whereof the condition is merely a defeasance, 11 Vin. Abr. 304. We notice with pleasure, in the case of voluntary bonds, one class of exceptions to the stringent exactions of specialties. Voluntary bonds are postponed in the administration of assets, to the simple contract debts of the deceased. If the assets are insufficient to discharge all the liabilities, and if these are both by specialty and by simple contract, the office of an executor would appear to be somewhat of the nature of a damnosa hereditas. Nay, even if the debts are of one class only, yet, owing to the confusion which the classification of assets and debts into different classes has introduced, he can hardly undertake the administration with any degree of confidence that some latent technicalities may not be the means of imparting to him an undesired amount of legal knowledge at a future day, when he may be called upon to pay out of his own estate the testator's debts, and for the want of a professional education on his own part. Specialty creditors, as we have stated, and as our readers are probably well aware, are entitled to priority over creditors by simple contract only, so far as the assets are legal; as equity acts on the maxim that "equality is equity," and pays specialty debts only pari passu with those incurred by simple contract. If, moreover, a specialty creditor has to resort for a portion of his demand to assets that are equitable, he will be postponed until the simple contract creditors have received the same proportion of the equitable assets that he has received from the legal assets. Equity requires this according to the maxim that "he who seeks equity must do equity." A sum due from an administrator who has entered into an administration bond is not a specialty debt to the administrator de bonis non, Parker v. Young, 6 Beav., 261; even though the sanction of the Ecclesiastical (Probate) Court has been obtained; Bolton v. Powell, 14 Beav., 275, 287; although it is a specialty to the ordinary. This absurdity appears to us not to have even a single agreeable feature, upon which the imagination could for a moment pleasantly dwell, or endeavour to draw therefrom some extenuation for the paradox. The bond, indeed, is confessed to the Ordinary, and in a court of law he alone could sue upon it. But, in equity, if it were only to avoid circuitry of action, there is a manifest reason that he should be regarded as a trustee for the administrator de bonis non. We really can conceive no greater perversion of so-called scientific reasoning than is exemplified by this rule of law and equity. The acumen of an executor must not be content with a scrutiny of the principles referred to in the foregoing remarks. He has carefully to distinguish the portion of his testator's liabilities by specialty, which is to be paid on contingencies that have not yet occurred from those liabilities by specialty, which are to be paid in futuro—a discrimination, the making of which, with the elaborate accuracy which a future Chancery censorship may require, his own sagacity aided by distinguished professional advice, may entirely fail of accomplishing. Amidst the dialectic labyrinth into which his mind shall have been plunged, the only legal principle he will be likely to remember is the costly one, "Ignorantia legis neminem excusat." The advice of the Court, which he can now obtain on petition without suit or by summons, under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, is his only adequate security. The rule of law just stated, in respect to liabilities of the description appears to be that liabilities by specialty which are contingent, and upon which it is uncertain whether anything will ever become payable, shall not stand in the way of simple contract debts; but, that if the liabilities will certainly become due, though on a future day, the special securities are then entitled to the priority of their class; Atkinson v. Grey, 1 Sm. & G. 577, 581. Thus, a bond conditioned for indemnity, Eeles v. Lambert, Ayley, 40 s. c., cited in Lancy v. Fairchild, 2 Vern. 101; a statute to perform covenants which are yet unbroken, Harrison's case, 5 Co., 28 b.; a recognizance conditioned to pay a certain sum or perform a certain act on a contingency which may never happen, as for instance when A. B., an infant, shall attain his majority; a covenant for further assurance; these and similar securities, prior to the breach of the condition, or the happening of the contingency specified, must not be regarded by the executor as entitling him to retain assets to meet these possibly forthcoming demands, to the prejudice of the simple contract creditors of the testator. Of this class of contingent securities, there appears further to be two derivative varieties; in one class of which, viz.: in those cases in which a breach of the condition has been committed by some positive act, the executor will be answerable out of his own property for a devastavit; while in those cases which are merely contingent, as in the case we have quoted, of an infant's attaining his majority, the specialty creditor is, in case of a deficiency of assets, remediless. Securities for indemnity, given by a principal debtor to his surety, ought, we think, to have been considered rather as liabilities payable in futuro than as contingent, inasmuch as the contingency is dependent upon the principal debtor for its realization; and this was held in Goldsmith v. Lidnor, 1 Roll. Abr. 925, tit. Exors. (C.) pl. 4, s. c. This old case appears, however, to have been disregarded by the current of modern decisions. When the contingency has taken place, or the condition has been broken, the security is equally a specialty, as before stated by us, whether the debt is ascertained or the damages are unliquidated; Cox v. Joseph, 5 T. R. 307. Finally, a specialty creditor of a testator, if injured by a devastavit, is but a simple contract creditor of the executor; Charlton v. Low, 3 P. Wms. 331. We can conceive nothing more inconsistent with the supposed rights of a creditor by specialty than the decision in Charlton v. Low. But the doctrines relating to specialty debts seem, like the laws of chemistry, incapable of assisting us in determining the result of any future case which may have a single element different from the components of those already analysed by judicial solution.

The anomalies which the distinction of debts into different classes has occasioned in cases of contracts inter vivos, appear to have been generated without any regard whatever even to the principles of technicality. Thus, the recital of a debt under hand and seal does not in law conclusively amount to a debt under seal; Lacum v. Mertins, 1 Ves. sen. 313. And the recital of its existence does not amount to an implied contract under seal to pay it; Iren v. Elwes, 3 Drew. 25. The point of this decision appears to be that sealing is a formality recognised by the law, not primarily or chiefly as a special mode of evidence, so much as an essential ingredient of the contract itself. For if it affected contracts by estoppel, and not by a direct and primary operation of its own, the recital ought to have been conclusive that the debt was of the highest nature, and had all the requisites which the law deems important, according to the maxim Omnia presumuntur rite acta. And yet the doctrine of estoppel has considerably affected the construction of similar cases; as, for instance, Stone v. Van Heythusen, Kay 721, in which case the fact of the creditors not being a party to the deed was considered material. Now, this could not be a very important circumstance, except in relation to the doctrine of estoppel, which, as our readers are aware, operates only between the parties to a deed. The reader will find in Kay 725, 726, and 3 Drew. 34, cases which exercised the acumen of the Court in no ordinary degree in determining whether recitals were only inoperative statements, or, on the other hand, by reason of their bearing upon the context, were capable of being construed as indicating an intention on the part of the debtor to transmute his simple contract debt into a debt by specialty.

Prior to the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 5), if a co-obligor to a bond paid even as surety the debt secured by the bond, he became only a simple contract creditor of the principal debtor. The surety was entitled in equity to an assignment of all collateral securities held by the creditor; but as the bond or judgment itself, which was the primary evidence of the debt, became extinguished by payment, he could not claim an assignment of it. His rights were thus determined by the stringency of the principal creditor, in exacting manifold securities from the principal debtor. Liabilities under covenants, as we have before observed, are of the same rank, whether they be for sums certain or sound merely in damages; Plumer v. Merchant, 3 Burr. 1380; Freemount v. Dedire, 1 P. Wms., 429. Yet, in Whitchurch v. Bargutan, 2 Vern. 272, where the husband, having agreed by marriage articles to settle a certain sum upon the issue, settled lands which were insufficient in value, and devised his unsettled lands for payment of debts, it was adjudged in equity that, as the articles did not contain any covenant in regard to the value of the land, the widow and children, although entitled to compensation, were yet to be postponed to creditors by bond. So, also, mortgage debts for the payment of which no covenant has been entered into, are only simple contract liabilities; Ferrot v. Austin, Cro. Eliz. 232. If a covenant for the payment of rent be contained in a lease, the landlord will be entitled to recover arrears for twenty years; while, if there be no such covenant, he can only recover arrears for six years. Rent in all other respects is equivalent to a debt by specialty; but, for the completeness of its legal incidents, special conveyancing is necessary—rent being an incident of tenure arising primarily from the privity of estate between the landlord and tenant. Yet with all these feudal and common law advantages, a covenant for its payment is still rendered necessary both to strengthen its feudal incidents as also to impose a personal obligation on the tenant independently of the privity of estate. Now, as voluntary bonds are postponed in administration suits to simple contract debts, why should not covenants which increase the landlord's rights beyond the standard of common law, be deemed so far voluntary, and, therefore, pious to the simple contract debts of the tenant. We merely wish to show that, once technical deductions were admitted to flow from the doctrines of contract by specialty, they should have been rigorously carried out to their legitimate consequences. Such an interpretation of the law would have been "inconvenient" indeed, but the effort to harmonise technical deductions with common sense and urgent necessity could only be attained, as has been the fact, by the introduction of uncertainty—a legal mischief still more to be deprecated than the practical application of technical reasoning based upon indistinct and erroneous data. Consistency and expediency may, however, be very easily subserved by the reform which we advocate.

Breaches of trust, even though the trust be created by deed, are only simple contract debts of the defaulting trustee. As, prior to the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, lands were not liable to the simple contract debts of a deceased owner, a cestui que trust, prior to the passing of that Act, required special conveyancing in order to have any remedy whatever against the real estate of a deceased trustee who had been guilty of a breach of trust. An acknowledgment under seal of a sum received under the trust deed will constitute the debt a specialty; an express agreement by the trustees to discharge the trusts will, likewise, have the same effect. But those cases really amount to positive and express stipulations, independently of that raised by the fiduciary position of the party. The law has in such cases hitherto acted not unlike a swindler, whose honour would not permit him to deceive except according to the standard routine. The law of specialties has transcended the ordinary limit of error incident to all human rules, and has been oppressive when it should have been lenient, and lenient where rigour was required. In point of fact, the security afforded by a deed is altogether precarious, and sometimes fails, as we have shown, even in cases such as those arising under trust deeds, where the peculiar privileges of a particular class of contracts should be viewed with least disfavour. In Robinson's Executor's case, 6 De G. M. & G. 372; 4 W. R., 186, it was decided that a call under the Winding-up Act of 1848 constitutes only a simple contract liability, even though the call be made under a deed executed by the contributory, or by the party whom he represents. This decision was arrived at only after two hearings on appeal, first before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) sitting with the Lords Justices, and subsequently before the same learned judges, assisted by two from the other side of Westminster Hall (Cresswell, J., and Martin, B.), the result being that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor Stuart was affirmed, but against the doubts of both the Lords Justices. So great was the difficulty in discovering what the law on this point, simple as the question involved was in itself! An Act of Parliament has since given the sanction of the Legislature to the doctrine laid down by the Vice-Chancellor, and affirmed by Lord Cranworth with the advice of two common law judges.

The current of judicial authority has harmonised with the rule of common law, in holding that a liability by specialty can only be raised by express words to that effect; implied covenants applying to real estate solely. The general scope of legislation in this department has likewise been to abridge the sphere of the operation of contracts by specialty. Thus the Bankrupt and the Winding-up Acts 1848, 1849, as already stated, as also the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 1, which relates to tithe, have in cases falling under them, changed special into simple contract liabilities. The only retrogressive enactment on this head has been the 8 & 9 Vict., c. 106, s. 3, which requires that leases for a period of more than three years shall be created by deed. But neither judicial nor legislative tendencies are competent to do anything more than to cause still further confusion, while the distinction itself remains as the basis for evolutions. If all contracts, as distinguished from specific charges, were reduced to the one uniform standard of debt by simple contract, all those complicated anomalies which we have endeavoured to detail, would cease to lengthen conveyancing and confuse our law.

VL (Continued).

COMPULSORY DOMICIL.

At the conclusion of the last article I was considering the domicil of servants of the Crown, upon which point I referred to the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon's executors, 12 Dec. C. Sess. 657, which is valuable as laying down the following doctrine: that it never was originally understood to be doubtful that the numerous functionaries in India and our Colonies effectually acquired domicils by their residence in the discharge of their duties, though it was clear that, but for their appointments they never would have quitted their original home. Even holding the power of the Crown to be as extensive as in this case was assumed, the only effect would be that the Crown had the power to oblige the party to change his domicil which it had at one time authorised him to acquire, and if he died before the power was exercised, and before the change took place, the domicil which he had acquired and which he retained till the moment of his death, must afford the rule for the determination of all questions regarding his personal succession. But it was a mistake to say that the Crown had the power to make the party change his domicil: the order to return might have been issued, but, according to the regulations affecting half-pay, the only consequence of his refusal to obey would have been the forfeiture of his half-pay (vid. Cockerell v. Cockerell, 4 W. R. 730,) so that in no sense of the term could it be said that the residence abroad was dependant on anything but his own will, though it was likely enough that that will might have been materially influenced by his recall. It was generally understood that officers in the latter predicament did not acquire a legal domicil in the quarters to which they might be sent and in which they remained in the performance of their duty; but the principle of the exception was not that the Crown had the power to recall them, but the more important consideration that it had the power to send them there, and that they presumably were there only in obedience to that power. The inference drawn thence was supposed to be, that however long their mere corporeal residence might be in any particular place, the residence is to be ascribed not to any animus of theirs but to the animus of their military superiors, to which, so long as they continued in the profession, they were bound to yield obedience. There was consequently in such a case a complete separation between the mere de facto residence in a particular locality and the animus of betaking themselves to that locality, and continuing in it, which last was indispensable to the existence of a domicil in the legal sense of the term; but analogy naturally failed in the most essential particular, when it was attempted to be applied to officers on half-pay. The Crown had no power to determine where they should remove themselves to. In a very recent case of The Attorney-General v. Napier, 6 Exch. 217 (15th Feb. 1851), a British born subject, an officer on service in her Majesty's army in India, died there intestate, leaving all his property situate in that country, with the exception of a small debt due to him from the War Office in England. His widow took out letters of administration in India, and after paying his debts, &c., invested the rest of the estate in India in her own name for her own benefit and that of the next of kin. She afterwards took out administration in England for the purpose of getting the debt due from the War Office. The Crown then claimed legacy duty on all the property of the intestate in England and India; and it was held that as the deceased was on duty in India in her Majesty's service he did not acquire a domicil in that country, and that the whole of his property, though chiefly situate abroad, was liable to legacy duty. It was likewise held that an officer in the service of the East India Company did thereby acquire a domicil in India. This case, therefore, is a confirmation (if any were wanting) of the observations made by Lord Fullerton and Lord Robertson in the case immediately preceding, and the principles upon which they both proceed are too plain to need explanation. The following cases may likewise be referred to on the same points: Logan v. Fairlie, 1 Myl. & Cr. 59; Jackman v. Forbes, 2 Cr. & Jer. 382; Attorney-General v. Jackson, 8 Bligh. N. S. 15; 2 Cl. & Fin. 148; In Re Ewing, 1 Cr. & Jer. 151; Arnold v. Arnold, 2 Myl. & Cr. 256. I have thus treated of the cases of a wife, and of a servant of the Crown, or of any great body having possessions or jurisdiction in a foreign country, such as the East India Company; for one instance is sufficient to evolve the principle.

With regard to the case of a minor or infant, that subject is so fully treated of in the next chapter, under the head "domicil of origin," that it would be but tautology to go into it at length here. I may, however, remark, that the condition of an infant in respect to his domicil, partakes of the character of all disabilities; he can have no legal status of his own, except that of origin, and as he is not responsible for any act which would make an adult liable (civilly speaking) unless he clearly adopts it when he has attained twenty-one, so he is dependent upon the status of his father for his domicil, and failing that, his origin is traceable to the country wherein he first draws breath—if on the high seas to that country to which the vessel belongs where he is born, and within cannon shot of the shore to that country off whose shore such vessel is lying, or in a port the limits would extend to the limits of such port.

The case of a domestic servant may be in some degree different from that of a servant of a public governing power, because the tenure is somewhat different. The ordinary tenure of domestics is, that both master and servant may separate from each other with one month's notice, although in the case of agricultural labourers it is understood that the hiring is for one year (see Reg. v. Twemlow, 4 W. R. 412; Lowther v. Earl Rudnor and Another, 8 East. 113; referring to the 20 Geo. 2, c. 19 & 31, ibid. c. 11, s. 3). These Acts apply to all labourers generally. The question of domicil upon this head can only arise where servants accompany their masters abroad, a very common case. Knowing the principles which govern the general law of domicil, it is only necessary to apply them to the case under consideration. Now, in every case where the will of the party is not an agent to determine the domicil, we must of necessity look at the power upon which they are dependent, and the domicil of that power becomes that of its subject or servant, and the only thing to refer to then is the duration and nature of the connection between them. As we have seen in the case before us, this is not certain for more than a year in one case, and may not last in the other except de mense in mensem. This, be it remembered, is where there are no assisting circumstances to help us in determining the question; for the same animus may reside in a servant as in an independent individual, and any expressions or acts forming an animus and factum would be sufficient, I apprehend, to override the rule of compulsory domicils. Thus, suppose a servant lives for a number of years in a family with whom he has gone to a foreign country, marries there, and has a home and family near the residence of his master, where he resides, only following his service at his master's house during the day, and having saved and possessing a competence, constantly declares his intention to leave the service whenever his master's family return to England, and to spend the remainder of his days at his chosen home. I think, upon such a state of circumstances, there would be little or no doubt, that if he died in the service his domicil would be in that foreign country, whether his master or mistress had acquired a domicil or not. On the other hand, a servant of an individual holding an office where the original domicil is not lost, in the ordinary course would follow such domicil; and the exception in this case, as in all others, proves the rule. The case of an apprentice can hardly apply to this question, because, generally speaking, he is a minor also; but supposing him of age, he has so little will in his movements that, whilst his indentures remain uncanceled, he must of necessity have the same domicil as his master. The determination of indentures otherwise than by cancellation involves a criminal question, and the apprentice would then come under another head of compulsory domicil, namely, that of a prisoner, of which hereafter. Our law is sadly bare of authorities on these heads, beyond what we find in the text books, and those generally the dicta of foreign writers. Thus Voet, art. 1, t. v. § 96, has the general proposition that servants follow the domicil of their masters, and the cases do no more than proceed upon the principles which govern the general law, and which I have endeavoured to apply at the outset of these observations. Thus in the case of Dalhousie v. McDowall, 7 Cl. & Fin. 331, 817, it was held that a servant who follows his master does not thereby lose his domicil of origin; cod. x. 40-7; Cod. Civile, art. 109. The fact is that a servant stands in a very different position to any other person under disability (if his case can indeed be classed with theirs, which is very doubtful) for he has the power, within a limited and time certain at least, to act as he pleases, in respect to his place of abode, whereas they must of necessity follow that of others, reside where they reside, and go where they go, moreover this even is not always necessary, for although for the time resident in another place, whether the domicil of their superior or not, their domicil and his still continues to be the same. Thus a slave can have no other domicil but that of his master whilst he continues in that relation to him. The best instance, perhaps, of compulsory domicil would be that of a prisoner, not because there is any doubt as to his domicil being that of the country in which he is imprisoned, but because he cannot leave it; and this element it is which determines his domicil. I speak now of an entire imprisonment, that is during the remainder of his days, for, in this case, the animus is taken away from him and transferred to that of the power holding him in durance, and the factum is represented by the place or locality in which he is imprisoned. Prima facie a prisoner does not lose his domicil of origin merely by the fact of being incarcerated, for it may be, and generally is for a limited time; and it must be presumed that, as soon as the term is over he will avail himself of his freedom to act according to his own will and convenience, and either regain his original domicil or acquire another, as circumstances may render it expedient or necessary for him to do.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Feb. 13.—Costerton v. Lacon, Bart.—The plaintiff is a solicitor of Yarmouth, and brought this action against Sir Edmund Lacon for slander, contained in a speech which he had made at a public dinner at Yarmouth, reflecting upon the character of the plaintiff, as a member of the committee for conducting a petition against the return of the defendant to the House of Commons.

After the evidence for the plaintiff had been given, counsel on behalf of Sir E. Lacon said he withdrew any charge he had made against Mr. Costerton, and regretted having made them.

The plaintiff's counsel said the plaintiff would never have brought this action, had he not have been pointed at as a person who had been engaged in most discreditable acts. If he had not brought the action, it would have been professional ruin to him.

The CHIEF JUSTICE said the result was highly creditable to the defendant, but he considered the plaintiff was bound to bring the action.

Verdict for the plaintiff for 40s. damages.

(Before Sir C. CRESSWELL.)

Feb. 13.—Winstone v. Winstone and Dyne.—The wife in this case had presented a petition for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. The husband had denied the cruelty, and charged the wife with adultery. The case was tried in February, 1860, and a verdict found for the husband on both issues. A petition for a dissolution of marriage by the husband, in which the same questions were raised, was tried in December last, and the husband again obtained a verdict on both issues, and a decree nisi was pronounced. An order for alimony pendente lite had been made in the judicial separation suit. Since the decree nisi in the second suit the wife had filed a petition for permanent alimony, alleging simply the amount of the husband's income.

Counsel for the husband moved that the petition for permanent alimony might be taken off the file. He submitted that such an application by a wife who had been proved to be guilty of adultery was unprecedented. But even if it were competent to the wife to make it under the 32d section of the Act of 1857, it ought to have been introduced in her answer in order that the husband might have had the opportunity of producing evidence on the trial of his petition, showing that her conduct had been such as to deprive her of a right to a permanent provision.

Counsel for the wife contended that the 32d section gave to the wife a right to apply for a permanent provision at any time before the decree finally dissolving the marriage was pronounced. It could not be necessary to introduce the prayer for alimony into the answer, because the court would not on the trial of the petition enter into the question of the husband's faculties.

His LORDSHIP took time to consider his decision.

In the course of his argument, counsel for the wife mentioned that an allegation of the husband's faculties was introduced into the petition in consequence of the information given at the registry as to the practice of the court in that respect.

His LORDSHIP repeated an observation which he has frequently made, that professional men ought not to go to the registry when they were at a loss upon a point of practice, and put questions to the clerks, who had other matters to attend to. They ought to take the advice of counsel.

WORSHIP-STREET POLICE-COURT.

Feb. 12.—John Robinson Gibson, 46 years of age, stated to be a solicitor residing at Edmonton, was charged with embezzlement.

Evidence having been given of the prisoner's non-accounting for £60 11s. and £31 5s. received by him on account of the Eastern Counties Railway Company on the 6th of September, 1860, and £31 5s. on the 7th of December in the same year, a remand was asked for to prove further defalcations.

Superintendent Kent, attached to the railway in question, said,—When I took the prisoner this morning at the Shore-ditch station he said in reference to the charge, "I've received the amounts, but not with any felonious intent. I shall not give any trouble. I am guilty."

A remand being applied for, and the prisoner expressing no desire to be admitted to bail, he was remanded accordingly.

Mr. Norton, one of the Masters of the Queen's Bench, has been appointed to the office of Queen's Coroner, and attorney in the place of the late Mr. Corner. Mr. J. G. Malcolm, of the Home Circuit, will succeed Mr. Norton as Master. The office of assistant master of the Crown Office has been abolished.

Mr. Francis Impey, of No. 12, Bedford-row, Middlesex, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer.

The Queen has been graciously pleased to grant unto John Fortescue Brickdale, of Newland, Gloucester, and West Monckton, Somerset, Esquire, Barrister-at-law, her royal licence and authority that he may, as one of the co-heirs of John Disker Inglett Fortescue, of Buckland Filleigh, Devon, Esquire, deceased, take and use the surname of Fortescue, in addition to and before that of Brickdale, and also bear the arms of Fortescue quarterly with those of Brickdale.

Parliament and Legislation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 11.

STATUTE LAW CONSOLIDATION.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill for clearing the statute book of a mass of useless matter, which, he said, was a preliminary stage in the ground work of the consolidation of the statute law. The Bill had been carefully drawn by Messrs. Reilly and Wood. It had been circulated during the recess to all the public offices, and the answers received from them in reply to questions put concerning the Bill shewed that it would require but very slight amendment.

The Bill was read a first time.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

In reply to a question from Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford said that this was the same measure as that introduced into the House last session.

FORGED TRADE MARKS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill for the protection of manufacturers against forged trade marks. The Bill proposed that the forging of trademarks, or the sale of articles bearing forged marks, with intent to defraud, and the using of marks falsely describing the quantity and quality of goods should be made misdemeanours punishable by fine and imprisonment. If the name or monogram of any particular artist were fraudulently attached to any work of art, that would be a misdemeanour and punishable in like manner.

Thursday, Feb. 14.

THE ADMIRALTY COURT.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill relating to the Admiralty Court, the object of which is to abolish the right of appeal from the Admiralty Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Friday, Feb. 15.

THE COURTS OF CHANCERY.

Lord ST. LEONARDS rose, to quote the words of his motion, "to draw the attention of the House to the report of the Commissioners of Inquiry as to the expediency of building new law courts on the same spot, and where the money was to come from, with a view of preserving the funds arising from the investment of monies belonging to the suitors of the Court of Chancery for their benefit and security; for which purpose the monies were laid out subject to certain charges, and for the reducing of fees payable to the Court by such suitor, for which object the funds stand appropriated."

Monday, Feb. 11.

LOCAL TAXATION AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

Mr. AYRTON intimated that on Friday week he would move for a select committee to inquire into the local taxation and government of the city of London, and the expediency of constituting the metropolis a county in itself for the administration of justice and management of its own affairs.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. This was only an amending Bill. One of the great evils it was necessary to remedy was the confusion that exists in bankruptcy between the judicial and administrative functions of the Court. The charges on the administration of an estate in bankruptcy amounted to 33 per cent. He proposed to appoint a chief judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, and to continue the five London Commissioners. The Bill would abolish the Insolvent Court and leave the administration of justice both in bankruptcy and insolvency, in the London district, in one and the same Court. That district was very extensive, stretching from the extremity of Norfolk on the one side to the borders of Hampshire on the other. Another part of the Bill proposed to augment the jurisdiction of the county courts, and to give creditors the power of removing an estate from the Court of Bankruptcy to the county court without any limit in point of amount, and that all petitions for removing bankruptcy should be presented in the first instance to the Court of Bankruptcy, except in those cases where the debts of the trader do not exceed £300. These changes were the most material changes made by the Bill, and were all the differences that exist on this part of the subject between the Bill of last session and the present. He then explained the course of procedure proposed by the Bill. One great object was to enable a bankrupt's estate to be administered and worked out without going into bankruptcy at all. He then described the powers and functions with which he proposed to clothe the creditors, and official assignees, and the nature of the discharge to be given to the debtor. The Bill abolished the distinction of the certificates to be given to bankrupts. The Bill described instances of misconduct which should warrant the judge in refusing or suspending the order of discharge or of committing the bankrupt to prison for any period of time not exceeding one year. Among the offences so enumerated was the acquiring of fictitious capital, and the trading with false capital, principally produced by the excessive and unjust application of accommodation bills. The chief judge is to have power to try bankrupts for criminal offences; but if the bankrupt desires it he may be tried by a jury. No appeal is allowed to any other tribunal. This procedure applied to trader debtors. With respect to non-traders he enumerated the following tests of bankruptcy, —abandoning from the country with the intent of evading creditors, a creditor being unable to find the debtor to enforce a judgment obtained by the ordinary process of law, and the debtor being arrested on final process and placed in prison. After-acquired property of non-traders should not be liable to debts due at the time of his insolvency. He explained the other details of the Bill, and in conclusion expressed his expectation that the portion of it which provided for private arrangements by means of deeds of composition would be found most beneficial, ensuring economy and expedition.

Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Crawford, expressed their concurrence in the measure; and it was commended by Mr. Walpole and other members.

Leave was given to introduce the Bill.

BANKRUPTCY COURT.

On the motion of Mr. MURRAY, returns were ordered of the revenue and expenditure, balances, and the number of sittings of the Court of Bankruptcy for the year 1860.

LAW OF LUNACY.

Sir G. C. LEWIS (in answer to Mr. Walpole) said that a Bill to amend the law of lunacy was in preparation, and he hoped to bring it in on an early day. He might also state that the Lord Chancellor intended to bring in a Bill on the subject of Chancery lunatics, which would be a separate measure.

Tuesday, Feb. 12.

DISQUALIFIED WITNESSES.

Sir JOHN TRELAWNY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he had been informed of a recent decision in the County Court at Rochdale by the judge, Mr. C. Temple, who is alleged to have nonsuited a plaintiff on account of the inability of the witness to affirm her belief in a future state of rewards and punishments; and whether, on the assumption that the judge ruled properly, the Government would deem it necessary to amend the law applicable to similar cases.

Sir G. C. LEWIS: In consequence of the notice given by the hon. baronet, I have been able to communicate with the judge who tried the case referred to. It was a case of Maden v. Catenack. The law is not at all narrow or intolerant with respect to the administration of an oath, because it permits the administration of any oath which is binding according to the religious belief of a witness; so that a Mussulman, a Hindoo, or a Chinese may be sworn according to the ceremonies which are binding upon his conscience, but which, nevertheless, all presume the existence of some religious belief. The only instance in which an oath is dispensed with is in the case of members of the Society of Friends, who are by a special Act of Parliament allowed to make a declaration which implies a religious belief, in lieu of an oath. That being the state of the law I can only say that it is not my intention to ask for leave to introduce any Bill to alter it.

Wednesday, Feb. 13.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER took the oaths and his seat for Bradford.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

On the motion for the second reading of this Bill, Mr. ROEBUCK objected to the Bill. The Bill was a complete failure. What could the chief judge, whom it was proposed to appoint, do, that was not already done by the Lords Justices? It was not proposed to diminish the fees now payable. The distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency was not done away with, for an act of bankruptcy on the part of a trader was not an act of bankruptcy on the part of a non-trader, and thus the distinction was preserved in spite of the Bill.

Mr. BOVILL said it was a matter for serious consideration whether the House would appoint a new chief judge at a salary of £5,000 a-year, in place of a tribunal which now worked well. By the Bill of last year it was proposed to abolish the messengers of the court. It was now intended to retain them at salaries not exceeding £500 a-year. While ready to admit the many excellent provisions of the Bill, he was not satisfied with it, and thought it was not such a one as the country had a right to expect.

Mr. LYSLEY said with respect to the appointment of a chief judge, that 19-20ths of bankruptcy business arose out of the collection and distribution of the estate, and suggested that the functions of the chief judge should be increased by giving him a general supervision over the administrative business of bankruptcy.

Mr. MOFFAT, Mr. J. C. EWART, and Mr. HADFIELD supported the measure.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied.

The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday next.

CRIMINAL LAW CONSOLIDATION (ENGLAND AND IRELAND).

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL moved for leave to introduce a series of seven Bills to consolidate and amend the statute law of England and Ireland relating to criminal offences.

Leave given.

LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. DUNLOP moved for leave bring in a Bill to afford facilities for the better ascertainment of the law of foreign countries when pleaded in courts within her Majesty's dominions.

The Bill was read a first time.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

QUALIFICATION FOR OFFICES BILL.

This Bill proposes that it shall not be obligatory on any one hereafter chosen mayor, alderman, common-councilman, &c., or to any office or magistracy relating to the government of any county or corporation of England, or "for any person who shall hereafter be admitted into any office or employment," or who shall accept any grant or commission from the Crown, to make and subscribe the declaration required by the Act of 1828 (repealing the Test and Corporation Acts), that he will not exercise the power, authority, or influence of his office to injure or weaken the Established Church, or to disturb that Church or its bishops and clergy in the possession of the rights and privileges to which they are by law entitled.

PRACTICE—AGENT—INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Draper v. The Manchester &c., Railway Company, L. L. J., 9 W. R. 215.

It was held in this case that under the common order for inspection of documents in a cause by the plaintiff, his solicitor and agent, the plaintiff could not appoint as his agent for the purpose of inspection, a professional accountant to whom the defendants, a railway company, objected on the ground that he was connected with a rival company. Lord Justice Turner, having observed that the words "solicitors and agents" had for some years received a limited construction, said that "it might not be necessary that an agent for the purpose of inspection must of necessity be a legal agent, but his lordship thought that he must be a general agent, and not an agent appointed for the special purposes of the case." The general practice no doubt has been to consider an order for inspection to be restricted to the party obtaining it and his solicitor and agent in the cause. There appears to be some doubt, however, whether it may not, where the case requires it, include a special agent to whom no objection could be made by the other side. In the present case there was a valid objection to the special agent, and therefore it was not necessary to decide the point generally.

* The facts of this case are stated ante p. 232.

Bonser v. Bradshaw, V. C. S., 9 W. R. 229.

This section enables Courts before whom any suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard or is depending, to declare the attorney or solicitor employed therein to be entitled to a charge for his costs upon the property recovered or preserved, upon which declaration the attorney or solicitor is to have a charge upon such property, and all conveyances to defeat the same, except to bond fide purchasers for value without notice, are to be void as against such charge.

In this case Sir J. Stuart, V.C., intimated an opinion that the section to which we have referred applies only to the case of a solicitor claiming his costs against the estate of an adult client. His Honour, however, does not appear to have stated any ground for this dictum, and it is not easy to discover in the enactment itself, any reason why it should be limited in the manner suggested. The words of the section are very large, and certainly include every "suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice," whether infants or any other class of persons not sui juris are parties, the Legislature having confided to the judge the discretion to decide in each case, whether the solicitor shall or shall not have the statutory charge upon the property recovered or preserved.

The Court of Queen's Bench in a recent case (Ex parte Thompson) has also come to a decision which will have the effect of limiting the application of this enactment in a manner, however, which appears consistent, and, indeed, required by its terms, and which is also reasonable in itself. The Court of Queen's Bench in this case held that the 28th section applies only to the costs of the particular suit or action in which the estate was recovered. The words of the section are that the solicitor is to have a charge "for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter, or proceeding." The words in italics, however, would doubtless be wide and general enough to include in some cases preliminary proceedings or attempts to accomplish without suit what afterwards required litigation to achieve.

Now that we have touched upon this section we may invite the attention of those of our readers who are particularly engaged in transactions between vendors and purchasers to the importance of the provision which makes the solicitors' charge in such cases indefeasible except by a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. It will be necessary for purchasers where it appears that the property may have been recovered or preserved, to be satisfied that no charge under this section is in existence; for, no doubt, should the purchaser have information of the fact of any suit, matter, or proceeding, in which the property might have been recovered or preserved, he would be considered to have constructive notice under the provisions of this section, of the solicitor's charge, if such existed. Mortgagees, moreover, not being expressly named in the exception, it is doubtful whether it would be held that they would have the advantage of the exception in favour of purchasers for value.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

GAVELKIND—DOWER ACT.

Farley v. Bonham, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 299.

It has been here decided that gavelkind lands are subject to the provisions of the Dower Act. The lands were in Kent, and it was an established part of the old law that by the custom of Kent, the wife, after the death of her husband, should have for her dower a moiety of all his lands and tenements of the nature of gavelkind; Robinson on Gavelkind, 3rd ed. 205. The Dower Act, by the interpretation clause, enacts that "land" is to extend to manors, advowsons, and all other hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal (except such as are not liable to dower). The simple question was, whether lands of the nature of gavelkind were comprised within these words? The language at first sight seems to be of the most comprehensive description, and to exclude all argument. It was argued, however, that the Real Property Commissioners, in their first report, had declared (pp. 16 & 19) that "they did not propose at present to extend the alterations of the law of dower to gavelkind lands, or borough-English lands, or to copyhold or customary lands, as to all which the right of dower or freebench was regulated by a variety of peculiar customs;" the inference being that such, also, was the intention of the Legislature. Further, that it had been held that the Act did not apply to copyholds; Smith v. Adams, 5 De G. M. & G. 712; Powdrell v. Jones, 2 Sm. & Giff. 415, in which case Stuart, V.C., observed, "The language of the statute itself shows that it refers only to estates which pass by deed and not by surrender, and the opinion of Lord St. Leonards is repeatedly expressed that copyholds are not within that statute." The observation was also made as against the operation of the statute that the words "of any tenure," which occur in the Fines and Recoveries Act, are omitted, as if purposely, from the Dower Act, though nearly of contemporaneous date, and it was contended that the latter Act contemplates dower at common law only, as distinguished from customary dower. Decisions on the Disgavelling Act, 31 Hen. 8, c. 3, show that that statute extended to no other custom of the land, save that of descent; Robinson, 3rd Ed. p. 97, and it was a principle of construction that general words in an Act of Parliament are not to be construed so as to alter the previous policy of the law, unless no sense or meaning can be applied to those words consistently with the intention of preserving the existing policy untouched; Minet v. Leman, 20 Beav. 269. These arguments were overruled by the Vice-Chancellor Wood. He showed that the policy of this Act, as stated in the report of the Commissioners, was to remedy the previous uncertainty in the system of law, and in the deduction of titles, owing to subtle refinements in the law of dower; and that the right of dower was of very trifling benefit to the widow, and often injurious to her, by involving her in litigation. These evils were met by giving the wife dower in all real property, whether real or equitable, where the husband had not clearly defeated her right by declaration. There was no contrast in the Act between customary dowers and dower at common law; the inconsistency, now rectified, was between legal and equitable estates. The decision that copyholds were not included in the Dower Act and the remarks of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, were founded probably on the circumstance, that generally, in the case of copyholds, the husband's disposition controlled the right to freebench. This reason could not apply to gavelkind land. The omission of the words "of any tenure," could not have the effect of limiting the large operation of the word "land." Moreover, the evils proposed to be remedied by the Act extended to gavelkind as well as to other lands. As to the Disgavelling Act of 31 Hen. 8, it was observed that that statute was passed on the petition of certain landowners in Kent, and the design of the Legislature was, not that the land should be divested of any of its former privileges in the case of forfeiture for felony and the like, but simply that it should be rendered partible. The Dower Act, on the other hand, was a measure founded on public policy. Upon the question of the construction of the statute, the Vice-Chancellor agreed with the observations of the Master of the Rolls, in Minet v. Leman, and after pointing out that the policy of the Act had direct reference to gavelkind lands, asked what there was to show that the proposed alteration in the law would be other than was intended, if the provisions of the new Act were extended to lands of this tenure. The customary right to dower was quite as strong as the common law right; there was nothing in the word "dower" to indicate a subject matter different from the general subject matter of the Act, and this was a case where the abrogation of a custom would benefit both husband and widow, and persons claiming as purchasers from them both. The conclusion was, that on every ground the widow was entitled to dower.

COMMON LAW.

COUNTY AND BOROUGH QUARTER SESSIONS—APPEAL, COSTS OF—8 & 9 WILL. 3, c. 30.

Reg. v. Recorder of Leeds, Q. B., 9 W. R. 270.

This was an appeal from the decision of a recorder, with regard to the costs of an appeal to the borough quarter sessions, under the following circumstances. Two justices of the borough of L. had made an order for the removal of a pauper to the township of B., against which order the parish officers of B. gave notice of appeal, stating to the overseers of L. their intention to appeal to the county sessions of the district within which the borough was situate. Previously, however, to the county quarter sessions being held, and before, also, the time of holding the borough quarter sessions (which had been fixed for a few days earlier than the sessions for the county), the appellants discovered that the appeal should properly have been to the borough sessions; and they then asked the respondents to try the appeal at the county sessions by consent—saying, at the same time, that if the respondents declined to accede to that proposal, the appeal of which notice had been given, must be considered as abandoned. The respondents refused to accede to the proposal made by the appellants, as jurisdiction could not be given by consent in the case of appeals against removal orders. They afterwards applied to the borough quarter sessions for the costs they had incurred in relation to the abandoned appeal, under 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 30, s. 3. This provision is to the effect that the county magistrates in their general or quarter sessions, upon any appeal before them there had concerning the settlement of a pauper, or upon proof there made of notice of appeal to the churchwardens or overseers of any place, though such appeal be not afterwards prosecuted, may at the same sessions award to the party in whose behalf the appeal shall be determined, or to whom notice of appeal shall have been given, their "reasonable costs and charges." It will be observed that this enactment, in its terms, applies only to county sessions and allows costs of appeal to be awarded there; whereas in the present case the application for costs was made to, and granted by, the borough quarter sessions. This difficulty, however, is probably removed by the general enactment in 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 76, s. 105, giving the recorder of a borough in his court of quarter sessions of the peace, cognizance of "all matters whatever" (with certain exceptions mentioned in the same Act) which are cognizable by any county quarter sessions: and further providing that he shall have power to do all things necessary for exercising such jurisdiction, notwithstanding his being sole judge. These general words seem to be sufficient to give a recorder jurisdiction over the costs of an appeal; but the point does not appear in the present case to have been brought before the Court of Queen's Bench—the question for their decision rather being whether the respondents were justified in treating the notice of appeal as a good one for the next borough sessions; in reference to which, alone, it had a legal application, however it might be worded. The Court were of opinion that they were justified in so treating it, and that consequently the recorder had jurisdiction to make an order for the costs of the abandoned appeal. This conclusion was chiefly come to on the authority of Reg. v. Recorder of Liverpool (15 Q. B. 1070). There the appellants made the same mistake, but discovering their error before anything was done, and having thereupon informed the other side (without any fresh notice), that the appeal was to be to the borough sessions, it was held that such notice enured as a valid notice of appeal for the borough sessions; and the recorder (who had entertained a different opinion, and had dismissed the appeal for want of due notice thereof having been given), was compelled by mandamus to hear the appeal notwithstanding.

MASTERS AND WORKMEN—CONSPIRACY—6 GEO. 4, c. 129, s. 3.

Walsby, app., v. Anley, resp., Q. B., 9 W. R., 271.

This is another decision upon the provisions in 6 Geo. 4, c. 129, prohibitory of conspiracies by workmen to obtain terms from their employers by intimidation and other improper practices. The law upon this important subject, so far as it was required by the case then before the Court, was luminously expounded by the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench to the following effect. Every workman is free to quit his master when he will if he be not bound by any contract to remain any specified time; and he may also tell his master that he will quit his service unless A. or B. be discharged. And not only a single workman may lawfully make such an announcement, but several may also make it each for himself. But beyond this workmen cannot go. They may not proceed in a body to their employer, and endeavour to coerce him by a threat that they will leave all together unless A. and B. be discharged. Such combination makes their conduct amount to a conspiracy at common law; and, moreover, seems to come within the 3rd section of the Act, which (among other things) makes it criminal for any person, by "threats or intimidation," to force, or endeavour to force, any person carrying on any trade or business, to limit the number or description of his workmen.

With regard to the distinction above taken by the Chief Justice, it may be remarked that it lies at the very foundation of the law of conspiracies—for a purpose is often criminal when concerted by several, which would not be of that character if entertained merely by an individual. And the reason given in the books is, that though every wrong may not be of a dangerous character to the public (which wrongs alone are punished by the criminal law), yet every coalition to promote wrong is clearly of that character.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—WHAT IS MAINTENANCE.

Earle v. Hopwood, C. P., 9 W. R. 272.

The offence of maintenance is punishable with fine and imprisonment by statutes still unrepealed; though in modern times it is chiefly heard of in connection with some contract which is sought to be set aside, on the ground that the consideration for it is illegal, as amounting to this offence. As to what maintenance is, we find one species of it defined as "an officious intermeddling in a suit that no way belongs to one by maintaining or assisting either party with money or otherwise to prosecute or defend it." This species of the offence is termed curialia, and if in addition the party maintaining stipulates to have part of the thing in suit, the offence is then known as champerty (1 Russ. on Crimes, p. 175). It is, however, to be remarked that there are many acts in the nature of maintenance which become justifiable from the circumstances under which they are done—and one instance is, when they are done by a barrister or attorney in the legitimate exercise of his profession. As to this, however, there are some nice distinctions, according to which the conduct of the party is justifiable or ranges itself under this offence. Thus, it is said that an attorney (but only when specially retained) may lawfully prosecute or defend an action for his client, and lay out his own money in the suit (Russ. ubi sup.), but this must not be coupled with an agreement to receive part of what is recovered; and the present case shows that neither can he so lay out his money, on the understanding that whether he is to receive remuneration at all is to depend upon the success of the action, and that the amount of his remuneration (if any) is to be proportionate to the value of what is recovered. A declaration framed on such an agreement, was demurred to as being bad in substance; and an unanimous judgment against it was given by the Court of Common Pleas, without even calling upon the defendant to support the demurrer.

Correspondence.

LORD CRANWORTH'S MORTGAGEES' ACT.

What would you do in this case? A client of mine has agreed to borrow £500 of another person upon security of a mortgage of certain freehold property, and as every pound of expense is matter of consideration, I propose to the mortgagee's solicitor to give a mortgage framed under the above Act of last session, so as to keep the deed as short and the expense as low as possible. The mortgagee's solicitor, however, declines to draw it under this Act, and proposes to draw it in the old full length style, with usual powers of sale, insurance covenants, covenants for title, &c., and to exclude the operation of the Act under the section enabling parties to do so, I know of no reason for this, except that it may make a difference of £5 in the costs of drawing, fair copy, engrossing, parchment, and stamps, which my client will have to pay. Is there any remedy for this, or what would a court of equity decide upon such a point in a case like this of an open contract, or in fact no contract at all except a verbal one? It appears to me to be matter of some professional practical importance, and it suggests the question whether or not in future agreements or memoranda of deposit of deeds by way of equitable mortgage, a clause ought to be inserted providing that any mortgage to be prepared in pursuance thereof should be drawn under or with reference to the above Act. Most banks, for instance, keep printed forms of agreements by way of equitable mortgage for use by their customers who may deposit deeds as a security for advances. In such cases I apprehend the bank solicitors will, until a contrary practice is established or decided, claim stare super antiquas vias in drawing mortgages thereunder. I should like to ascertain the general professional opinion on this matter.

A PROVINCIAL SOLICITOR.

"CHANCERY CHAMBERS." APPLICATIONS UNDER THE DEFENCE ACT.

SIR,—I observe in recent numbers of your publication (ante, pp. 195 & 233) you have advocated the extension of procedure by summons at chambers to applications relating to money paid into court under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. I beg to direct your attention to a provision for this very purpose in relation to money paid in under "The Defence Act, 1860" (23 & 24 Vic., c. 112) contained in sect. 23 of that Act. I have not observed that you referred to this enactment, and therefore infer that it has escaped your notice or your memory.

WETHERBY.—Informer: how for a competent witness.—Jackson v. Knowles.—This case was heard before the borough magistrates on the 7th instant. It was an information preferred under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 85, against the defendant, for compelling a young person under the age of 21 to ascend a chimney for the purpose of sweeping it. Mr. Granger, for the prosecution, proposed to examine the informer as a witness, to which Mr. Bruce, for the defendant, objected, on the ground that he had a pecuniary interest in the result of the information; under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 85, s. 7, which gives half the penalty to the informer. In support of the objection he cited 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 15, which enacts that every prosecutor of any information not having any pecuniary interest in the result of the same shall be a competent witness to support such information, and also Arnold's "Duties of a Justice out of Sessions," p. 22, where that enactment is treated as still subsisting un repealed. The magistrates allowed the objection. [We may mention that Mr. Oke, in the last edition of his "Magisterial Synopsis," pp. 63 and 143, lays it down that so much of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 15, as prohibits an interested informer from being a witness is repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 2; and that the informer is now in all cases a competent witness. It appears strange that upon a question which must arise repeatedly there should be such a difference of opinion between two very eminent authorities—one of them administering justice law in the City and the other in Westminster, and both publishing their treatises in 1860.—ED. S. J.]

Ireland.

Mr. John Pitt Kennedy has been appointed Crown prosecutor for the county of Tyrone, vacant by the death of Mr. Leatham, Recorder of Londonderry.

Mr. Serjeant Sullivan has been appointed law adviser to the Castle, in the place of Mr. Lawson, Q.C., the new Solicitor-General. It is stated that Mr. A. S. Mehan has been appointed Recorder of Londonderry in the room of the late Mr. W. P. Leatham.

Review.

The Law of Debtor and Creditor. By CHARLES FRANCIS TROWER, M.A., Barrister-at-law. Stevens; Sweet; Maxwell. 1860.

A treatise upon the law of debtor and creditor has been a desideratum to the legal public these many years. The book before us professes, not without reason, to be a compendium of the law upon this extensive class of legal relations, and to dispense with the hitherto necessary references both to the equity and law shelves of a library, for information upon questions of debt and credit. The law of debtor and creditor is, in one sense, obviously co-extensive with the entire sphere of contracts. A debt, indeed, cannot properly be said to be created as long as the contract from which it may arise is in fieri, and not actually completed. Nevertheless, in all cases of contract a certain liability is incurred by at least one of the contracting parties. The terms debtor and creditor, however, are generally used both in colloquial and legal phraseology, in reference to that class of obligations in which a certain ascertained sum of money is due from one of the contracting parties to the other—as distinguished from those cases of assumpsit, covenant, or tort, in which the amount of the liability is unascertained. A treatise, then, on the law of debtor and creditor suggests to us by its terms that it describes the results rather than the origin or nature of contracts. We should expect to find in such a book the principles of pleading, practice, and evidence, in relation to debts; their enforcement, release, or liquidation; but not an examination of the law of contracts; or, if such a treatise alluded to the conditions and circumstances of legal contracts, we should at all events expect mention of those species only which arise merely out of the relative status of the parties, independently of any collateral securities, such as mortgages, pledges, or liens, for the enforcement of the debt, or the performance of the contract.

Mr. Trower states his design to be, "by avoiding, as far as possible, everything which is not law at the present moment; by stating the results of decisions rather than their reasons; and by aiming at condensation of expression as well as of matter; to compress a practical treatise upon the entire subject into a single volume." The chief cause, he adds, which has deterred text writers from a task like his, appears to be "the risk of perpetual legislative changes." The extent over which a comprehensive treatise, such as the book before us, travels, is, on the other hand, a counterpoise to this legislative obstruction to the vitality of an author's fame, inasmuch as a great portion of the existing law of contracts must continue unaffected by a legislation which is studiously partial and incomplete. Mr. Trower notices Lord St. Leonards' Act to further amend the Law of Property, passed in the last session, as a specimen of this piecemeal method of law reform, and considers that the claims of creditors have been unduly depreciated in a zeal bestowed upon the interests of purchasers exclusively. With this view we entirely concur, and we are happy to find our opinion upon this point corroborated by Mr. Trower. The first three chapters of his book relate to judgments, and are a complete abridgement of the laws relating to this class of debts. The consolidation of the statute law, "its administration by one set of courts, animated by the same principles, and regulated by the same procedure, together with an authoritative declaration of Parliament as to the conflicting decisions of our 'case' law," are the remedies suggested by Mr. Trower for the weighty and manifold burdens under which the legal public of this empire labours. These are, no doubt, desiderata; but are also likely to continue so. The disuse of ceremonies, such as sealing documents in cases of contracts, would tend, as we endeavour to show in our present number, to remove very many of the intricacies of that branch of law with which we are just now more immediately concerned.

The law of debtor and creditor does not admit so easily of a scientific exposition as many other equally or more complicated branches of law. The laws of real property, for instance, are characterized by the regard for tenure and seigniorial rights which their feudal origin impressed upon them. This characteristic of tenure runs through our whole real property system, and whenever it conflicts with the claims of creditors, these, unless protected by statute, are ignored. We have no similar pervading principle in the law of personal property. Smith's lectures on contracts is a work as scientifically constructed perhaps as an elementary outline on the subject could be. Yet, surely, the philosophy of the law of contracts in general, or even of the law of debtor and creditor, which is less extensive than that of contracts, whereof it forms only a part, must have an intimate connexion with the first principles of juridical science. The subject at the present time has any especial interest, owing to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, which is a remnant of the last session that is likely immediately to become law in some shape. This view of the question, however, is too ephemeral to be had in view in a treatise which naturally seeks more enduring bases. Mr. Trower does not enter upon the juridical relations of debtor and creditor, but, as a plain lawyer, states what the law is, not what it ought to be.

His division of the subject is simple, and violates no logical rule. The treatise is divided into two parts, the first of which comprises judgment, specialty, and simple contract debts, as between subjects; the second, mortgage debts, annuities, and Crown debts. The principle of this division appears to be the distinction between debts strictly as such, and debts secured by being specifically charged on property. He says, in some cases, indeed, the result of a debt "follows so simultaneously upon the contract as to be hardly distinguishable from it. Thus, in the case of goods sold and paid for over the counter, the debt and contract seem contemporaneous." It has been well, we think, for Mr. Trower that he confined the scope of his treatise to statement but little diversified with metaphysical disquisitions. A purchase of goods has nothing akin to a debt. All debts are contracts or the results of contract; but all contracts are not cases of debt. The terms debt and contract are not synonymous in our law, although they are in the law of France. These terms differ in our use of them, as a part differs from the whole; a debt being a contract merely to pay a certain specified sum of money: sales and purchases in themselves, and as distinct from corroborative stipulations, being simply nothing more than commercial exchanges, of the circumstances attending which political economy or social science may take cognizance; but such transactions have no legal significance. Mr. Trower adopts the usual threefold division of debts—by judgment, by specialty, and by simple contract. He then considers these three classes of debts in two periods of time—as they confer rights during the life of the debtor, and as they confer rights after his death. A consideration of the relative status of debtor and creditor, and of the remedies upon contracts, opens up a sufficiently wide field for a comprehensive survey. Mr. Trower's book, however, treats not only of the relations of debtor and creditor according as these are defined by the character and form of the contract, but also contains much learning that is usually considered as appropriated to works on equity or real property. He states in an able but concise manner the law relating to the especial province of his treatise; and incidentally to this, he gives succinctly the law of marital rights, coverture, infancy, and legal incapacity. The third chapter of the first part of his book contains a neat summary of the law of partnerships and public companies. The second chapter of the second part contains a tabular statement of the parties necessary in suits after the death of the debtor. The chapters on mortgages are very concise abridgments of the law of these securities. The parts relating to judgments, assets, rent, and clubs, also deserve notice. Mr. Trower expresses himself with somewhat of indignation upon the present state of the laws relating to joint stock companies. This is a branch of law, however, which does not admit of an easy consolidation, inasmuch as the intricacies naturally inherent in such a complication of rights cannot be removed by legislation. Although mercantile law does not differ in principle from the laws relating to contracts generally, yet, owing to the numerous parties that are frequently concerned in a common mercantile undertaking, and bound by the same contract, mercantile law has become so varied in its details as to be deemed on the Continent a distinct province of law, and even in England to possess almost specific peculiarities. It is not, then, a province the most promising for law reformers. An appendix of sixty pages is given, containing a tabular view of all the Courts in England and Wales for the recovery of debts. It specifies the nature of the jurisdiction and the procedure of each court, and states many other interesting and important particulars.

Mr. Trower sometimes diverges from his prescribed course not by offering original suggestions, but by treating of matters such as donations mortis causa, which are only connected with the question of debts in the same manner that the national debt is—as lessening the fund of the subject for paying his debts. Mr. Trower offers no philosophic ideas upon the subject of his treatise. It is a bare compilation; but, we must add, that the province of his labours is certainly one not giving easy access to the philosophic exponent. He condenses much matter sometimes, indeed, in a phraseology inelegant; but he is at all times fluent in expression, and never leaves his statement of the law, which he is describing, incomplete. His work may be considered a handbook of many branches of law, and we confidently recommend it to the favourable notice of the legal public.

A deputation of Lancashire magistrates had an interview with Sir G. C. Lewis at the Home-Office on the 12th inst., on the subject of the expenses of criminal prosecutions, and the scale of allowances to witnesses at sessions and assizes, and on the effects of the inadequacy of such allowances in aiding the escape of criminals and checking the prevention of crime.

Obituary.

OWEN OWENS, Esq.

Mr. Owen Owens was a solicitor of Holyhead, and departed this life at the latter end of last month. By his talent and perseverance he had risen from an humble position to very great eminence in the legal profession. As a lawyer, he was of strict integrity, and faithful to his clients. He stood in the first rank as a session pleader, and enjoyed the highest confidence of the magistracy, as well as his professional brethren. His practice for a long period had been a very lucrative one, and he always discharged his professional duties with unsullied fame. He was a gentleman of sound general knowledge. His clients always spoke highly of him as one who never incited to litigation, but would rather appease hostilities, and advise an amicable settlement, if at all practicable. His funeral took place on the 1st inst., and so greatly was he respected that hundreds of persons of all grades and positions in life paid their last tribute to his memory by being present.

HINTS TO ARTICLED CLERKS.

No. I.

We propose to devote a few columns of the Solicitors' Journal to some hints to those who are still in statu pupillari, upon the best mode of conducting their studies and regulating their conduct during the period of clerkship. It is surely unnecessary for us to say that we feel the warmest interest in their welfare, remembering as we do that it is upon them that will hereafter rest the duty of maintaining the honour of the profession to which they aspire to belong. Some twenty years ago the writer himself belonged to the body which he now addresses, and he then painfully felt the want of some guide through the labyrinth which he saw extended in apparently endless mazes before him. Since that time indeed, several works of more or less repute have appeared upon the subject of legal education; but all of them labour under one radical defect, namely, that of aiming too high, and of setting before the student an amount of labour which could hardly be accomplished in the course of a long life-time, much less in a period varying in time from three to five years. These authors appear to have forgotten that life is short, although they cannot be charged with obliviousness of the fact that art is long: One might gather from them that their readers intended to become legislators or juriconsults, and not solicitors. Perhaps nothing is so disheartening to a young man as to have an impossible task set before him, and to be told that unless he performs it, he cannot be deemed adequate to the profession which he has chosen. He turns away with disgust from his mentor, and the great probability is that, feeling he cannot do all, he will not attempt to do anything. If, on the other hand, he does enter upon the prescribed course of study, and endeavours faithfully to go through with it, he will load his mind with many a useless burthen, learn a good deal that he must afterwards unlearn, and waste much valuable time. Few spectacles are so melancholy as that of honest, persevering labour wholly misdirected and misapplied, and thus producing not a tithe of the result which half the same amount of work would have accomplished had it been directed into the proper channels. Another defect under which the writers referred to labour is that they do not sufficiently impress upon the minds of their readers the all-important fact that the business of an attorney and solicitor can no more be learned by mere reading than can the art and mystery of boot-making. In order that a man may practise successfully as an attorney, he must not merely know what the law is, but he must know how to apply and use it. This can only be learned by steady and unflinching attention to the duties of the office. If an attorney could be duly qualified as such by the mere study of books, the service under articles would be a useless, impertinent and expensive form, since very few attorneys give any formal instruction to their clerks or direct their course of reading. The object of being articulated is that the clerk may see how actual business is conducted, so that in due time he may conduct it himself, and however learned he may be in the theory of law, he will assuredly not be competent to practise it, unless during his clerkship he has gone faithfully through what is sometimes, although very improperly, called the drudgery of the office. There is much work, and work, too, of an exceedingly profitable kind, in every trade and profession which is routine, and a knowledge of which can only be acquired by practice, and he is a mere simpleton and knows nothing of the duties and responsibilities of actual life who neglects to acquire this knowledge, because he thinks it beneath him. The clerk has undertaken by his articles "faithfully and diligently to serve his master in his profession of an attorney-at-law;" and the discharge of the duty which he has thus imposed upon himself will, like the discharge of every other duty, carry with it its own exceeding great reward in a thorough practical knowledge of an honourable and remunerative profession.

We have used the expression, "remunerative profession," and here perhaps it will be proper, although by way of parenthesis, to guard the article clerk against being discouraged at the very outset of his career by being told, as it is not unlikely that he may be, "Oh! the profession is nothing now to what it once was. You have fallen upon evil days and times. The changes which have been made in the law of late years have cut down profits to a minimum;" and so forth. That vast changes have been made and are still in progress is indeed perfectly true, but still we may be permitted to doubt, for reasons which we will not now enter upon, whether they have diminished the profits of the attorneys, as a body. The profits on individual transactions have been diminished, and some costly proceedings have been entirely swept away from our legal system; but the very fact that men may now go to law without incurring ruinous expense and delay, coupled with the prodigious increase of late years in the wealth and population of the country, has fully compensated for any loss which may have accrued to the profession from law reform. There are croakers in all callings who are never so well pleased as when they can prove to their own satisfaction, and that of their hearers, that the class to which they belong is irretrievably ruined. Do you pay no heed to such prophets of evil; and rest assured that the profession which you have chosen must, so long as the prosperity of this country endures, and so long as human nature remains what it is, continue to afford substantial rewards to its laborious and learned professors.

So much by way of introduction to our subject, which may naturally be divided into three main topics:—

- I. The article clerk's conduct in the office.
- II. His course of professional reading.
- III. His general conduct during the period of his articles.

Upon all these subjects the advice offered will be the result of the writer's own experience and observation during a five years' clerkship, and a practice of nine years as an attorney.

I. THE ARTICLE CLERK'S CONDUCT IN THE OFFICE.

It is all-important that the article clerk should enter the attorney's office with a deeply-rooted and salutary conviction of his own ignorance. If we were asked to point out what was the best preparation for learning, we should answer without a moment's hesitation—Humility. We do not mean the "humbleness" of Uriah Heep, but that frame of mind which may well be felt by a man fully conscious of his own powers, when he knows that he is entering upon an entirely new sphere, and planting his foot on paths which he has not hitherto trodden. The article clerk should fully recognise the fact on the outset of his career that he has everything to learn, and that no detail of office duty can be too trivial for his attention. There is, probably, no one, from his master down to the lowest clerk, from whom he may not learn something, and no one who will not be glad to give him information if he frankly admits his own ignorance, and shows a desire to replace it by knowledge. There are few persons who, being conscious of the possession of knowledge, are not glad to impart it to those who manifest a desire for its acquisition, provided the inquirer is willing to admit, at all events pro hac vice, his own inferiority. Unless, however, this admission is made,—if the article clerk shows that he thinks himself omniscient, or if he gives himself the airs of an accomplished lawyer during the first year of his articles—he will find all the avenues of information closed to him by his own foolish pride. Nothing disgusts an older man so much as an air of self-sufficiency in a younger one; while, on the other hand, nothing conciliates his regard so much as an ingenuous admission by his juniors of their ignorance and of his knowledge. A priggish, conceited youngster is a bore and a nuisance in all societies; but when he has to take a part in the actual business of life he becomes absolutely intolerable.

We trust, however, that the article clerk who reads these lines has made the first great step to knowledge by confessing to himself the depths of his own ignorance, and that he is therefore willing to be instructed. He will then not be ashamed to appeal to his master or to his fellow clerks for help and advice when he meets with anything in the office routine which puzzles him, and as to which he can obtain no information from his books. The art of asking questions is one which he ought to cultivate most assiduously; and an art it really is, for every one does not know when, how, and from whom to ask them. For instance, the clerk who appeals to his master for a solution of his doubts when the latter is wholly absorbed in some important business, who frames his queries so clumsily as to show that he has not previously digested the subject in his own mind, and does not even precisely know what is the point upon which he wishes to be informed,—or who troubles his master for information which he might equally well get from the engrossing clerk, shows that he has not mastered the art of question-asking, and must therefore sometimes expect to be laughed at or snubbed for his pains. Nor ought the clerk to ask questions where he might with a little trouble acquire the information for himself, either by consulting a treatise, or exercising his own powers of observation or reasoning. When he has taxed these resources and they have failed him, or where the exigencies of business do not give him time to appeal to them, then he may reasonably seek for oral information. While, moreover, we counsel the asking of questions, the clerk must remember that he cannot expect to have all his difficulties solved at once. It would be preposterous for him to insist upon being acquainted with the rationale of everything that passes around him, and he must therefore use some moderation in pumping his instructor and fellow clerks, and hope that "in some other day, at some other place," his doubts will be removed.

THE NEW CHANCERY ORDER—INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS.

We extract the following from the Times City article of the 11th inst.:—

"The order of the Court of Chancery regarding the investment of trust funds, posted in the Stock-Exchange on Saturday, was simply, it is presumed, in formal compliance with the Act passed last session, authorizing the employment of such funds in a wider range of securities than has hitherto been permitted, an Act which, from the extent to which it was carried, was regarded by prudent persons with much regret. Among the new investments allowed is Bank Stock, and a more dangerous precedent could not have been established. This stock merely represents the capital of a trading corporation, over which the Government have no control, and, although it happens to be the most sound and influential corporation in the world, its stability still depends upon private management, with respect to the successful continuance of which through future generations the Government and Legislature could have no right to enter into any assumptions. We all regard the Bank of England as a type of the strength of the country itself, and most persons—especially after recent experiences—would prefer holding a Bank of England obligation to any pledge, whether in the form of a telegraph guarantee or otherwise, from our modern State financiers; but that has nothing to do with the principle now involved. The Court of Chancery is bound to keep the funds of which it has the custody under the control of the State, and should on no account place them entirely out of its reach, to be managed for profit or loss by a body of independent directors. At the same time the example furnished to private trustees is of the worst description. We shall soon probably have an agitation which will be difficult to answer for a logical carrying out of the new system. If one joint-stock bank is to be selected, why not another, especially when the favoured establishment happens to be founded, like the Bank of England, on limited liability, which a majority of our legislators still pretend to regard as highly dangerous and objectionable, in comparison with the unlimited plan? The Bank of England, moreover, is a constant mark for the grasp of every hard-pressed Chancellor of the Exchequer. For 50 years this has been the case. At one period the Government action in that respect caused a sudden fall of 20 or 30 per cent. in the value of the stock, and it is a curious circumstance that while Mr. Gladstone was countenancing the present measure he can scarcely have been unconscious that in the course of a few months he would be likely to make a proposal to the proprietors which, had it been accepted in its original form, would have been followed in the market by a serious depreciation."

The following letter on the subject also appears in the same journal:—

Sir,—With reference to your observation on the recent order of the Court of Chancery sanctioning the investment of trust funds committed to its care in the stock of a trading corporation, allow me further to call your attention to the sanction the Court has given to the investment in Indian stock. It does not appear whether this is Indian Loan or stock of the defunct East India Company, but I assume it to be the latter. This stock is now nearly 220, but it is redeemable in 1874 at £200; the investment consequently involves the loss of 10 per cent. in the capital, and the adoption of it is a sacrifice of the interests of those entitled in remainder, or to the corpus, to those presently entitled to the income—a principle which it is not easy to justify, and which must surely have escaped the attention of the Chancery judges.

"It is difficult to understand why these eminent authorities have not sanctioned an investment in funds guaranteed by the Imperial Government, such as the Turkish 4 per Cents.—I remain, Sir, your obedient servant, "A SOLICITOR."

REPORTS AND MEETINGS.

BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY.

The directors of this company will recommend at the approaching meeting a dividend of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum.

CHARING CROSS RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting, held on the 13th instant at the London-bridge station, the Hon. J. Byng in the chair, it was resolved that the proposition for extending the line to Cannon-street should be carried out. By this extension passengers could be conveyed from Cannon-street to Charing-cross in six minutes, the time now occupied by omnibuses being twenty-five minutes. It was stated that a large increase of traffic might be anticipated from this source.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

The directors recommend that a dividend of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum be paid for the year ending the 31st Dec. 1860. This will leave a balance of about £13,000 to be carried forward to the next half-year.

HULL AND SELBY RAILWAY.

A dividend of £2 10s. per £50 or whole share, and in like proportions on the half and quarter shares, was declared at the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on Monday last.

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.

The directors by their report recommended that a dividend of 6 per cent. per annum (less income tax), carrying a balance of £22,007 to the next half-yearly account.

At the half-yearly meeting of the company, held on the 13th inst., the report was confirmed.

The directors have introduced into Parliament five Bills for extensions and branches, and seek authority to raise £500,000 additional capital beyond the cost of the new railways.

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

The directors of this company resolved, on the 13th inst., to recommend to the ordinary meeting, to be held on the 22nd inst., a dividend at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum for the half-year ending the 31st of December last, leaving a balance of £27,000 to be carried forward.

LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 14th inst., the report of the directors, recommending that a dividend of £5 5s. per cent. per annum be declared, and to be payable on the 28th instant, was adopted.

MID KENT RAILWAY.

The directors of this company recommend a dividend of £5 per cent. per annum.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

The directors report that the traffic receipts for the last half-year have been very satisfactory. They recommend that the following dividends (less income tax) be declared, and payable on the 1st of March, viz.—

£3 10s. upon each £100 of consolidated stock.

£2 16s. 3d. upon each £100 of Birmingham and Derby consolidated stock.

£3 10s. upon each £100 of preferential and Erewash Valley stock.

£2 5s. on each £100 of consolidated $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. preferential stock.

£2 upon each £100 of Leicester and Hitchin preferential stock.

£2 5s. upon each £100 consolidated irredeemable.

$4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. preferential stock.

1s. 4 1-5d. on each £6 preference share.

5d. upon each £6 4s. share, being 91 days' interest on the deposit at 7 per cent. per annum, leaving a balance of £3,726 for the next half-year.

NORTH EASTERN RAILWAY.

The directors report a considerable increase in the traffic receipts, and recommend the following dividends to be declared, viz.—

On the Berwick ordinary stock, at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; and on the Thirsk and Malton stock, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

On the York ordinary stock, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY.

The report of the directors states that the general prospects of the undertaking are satisfactory. At the half-yearly meeting, held on the 14th instant, the recommendation of the directors that a dividend of 4 per cent. per annum should be declared, leaving a balance of £3,859 6s. to be carried forward to the next half-year, was adopted.

ROYSTON AND HITCHIN.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 11th instant, the following resolution was moved and carried unanimously—viz., "That a dividend after the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, less income-tax and 1d. per £6 5s. stock for expenses of management, adding to the dividend 6d. per £6 5s. stock, as determined by the proprietors on the 13th of August last, be declared on the Royston, Hitchin, and Shepreth consolidated stock for the half-year ending the 1st of February, 1861, and be paid forthwith."

SOMERSET CENTRAL RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held on the 9th instant, resolutions declaring a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum (less income tax), converting paid up shares with consolidated stock, and re-electing the retiring directors and auditor, were passed.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE RAILWAY.

At a special meeting of this company, held on the 14th inst., the proposal for a transfer of the lease of the line from Mr. McLean to the London and North Western Co. was carried by a large majority.

STOCKTON AND DARLINGTON RAILWAY.

At a recent meeting of this company a dividend of 9½ per cent. per annum was declared on the ordinary shares, after payment of the following dividends on preference shares:—viz. 5 per cent. per annum on the preference A shares, 6 per cent. per annum on the preference B and C shares.

The following amongst other Bills have been sent up for consideration on their merits before committees of the House of Lords:—Charing-cross (City terminus), Cornwall, Dartmouth, and Torbay, Devon Valley; Eastern Counties and Saffron Walden; Edgware, Highgate, and London; Finsbury-circus Railway Station; Hammersmith, Paddington, and City Junction, Kensington and North and South London Junction, Metropolitan (extension to Finsbury-circus), North-Eastern and South-Western, North London (branch to the City and widening), North Metropolitan Junction, Victoria Station and Pimlico, and West London Extension.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 23, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

We desire to call attention to a novel feature of the Solicitors' Journal, which we expect will be found useful to our readers. In last week's number, under the head "Public Companies," we gave a list of the Bills in Parliament for new lines of railways in England and Wales (where the standing orders of both Houses of Parliament have been complied with), and also short notes of the reports and meetings of a number of companies; presenting thus at a glance a great deal of information which cannot be found in such a form elsewhere. It will be seen by reference to the same head in our present impression, that our intention is not to confine ourselves to railway companies only. We hope very soon to make this part of the Solicitors' Journal so complete as to include all public companies of any importance. But, as at present advised, we purpose restricting ourselves, for the most part, to the two general subdivisions of new companies, and reports of meetings of established ones. We shall be happy to receive suggestions upon the subject, having already had the satisfaction of learning from various quarters that this new feature of the Journal meets with general approbation.

The loud complaints which for many years past have been made on the subject of the wholesale adulteration of food induced the Legislature to pass an Act last session for the purpose of putting an end to such practices. But it has been hitherto inoperative, and we fear that while it remains unaltered it is likely to continue so. It depends, in the first place, upon the vestries in London, and upon the town councils in boroughs generally, to appoint an officer for the purpose of enforcing its provisions. If they do not choose to appoint such an officer, the Act must remain a dead letter. It would, no doubt, be competent for private parties to take proceedings on their own account, and possibly some public-spirited individuals may at times be found willing to incur the necessary trouble and expense. But this is a duty which the public at large will not willingly undertake. We would further observe that the Act, even if enforced, is singularly lenient in its provisions, for it only allows of the publication of the offender's name in the newspapers after he has been twice convicted. Lastly, it allows medical drugs and medicines of every kind to be adulterated with impunity. We need not be surprised, therefore, that the Act has created much dissatisfaction, and that it has been denounced at more than one vestry meeting as a piece of clumsy and useless legislation. We trust that it will be now amended, for the necessity of a measure of this kind has been long and universally admitted.

Our attention has been called to an attempt which is being made by some few London firms of solicitors to obtain the business of country firms on lower terms than are consistent with the customary usage of the profession. We abstain from giving any further publicity to the matter than is necessary for the purpose of calling the attention of our readers to it; but we reserve to ourselves the right of offering, at a future time, some observations upon the questions involved in this proceeding. A year or so ago we alluded at some length to an absurd project then afoot, the professed object of which was in effect to do away with the present system of metropolitan agency. That scheme failed altogether, and as ignobly as everybody expected. The new plan appears to be that certain town firms should take upon themselves the task of soliciting country business upon lower terms than custom has hitherto permitted. Our provincial as well as our metropolitan readers may have something to say upon the matter, and our columns will be equally open to both; as our single aim is, what it always has been, the general good of the profession, and not of any one section of it, at the expense of any other.

At the last Yorkshire winter gaol delivery the grand jury made a presentment as to the insufficient scale of costs allowed to prosecutors and witnesses in criminal prosecutions. We are glad to see that this has been followed up by the justices of the West Riding, a deputation from whom had an interview with the Home Secretary on the same subject, on Friday, the 15th instant. In answer to a question put by Mr. Egerton on Thursday evening, Sir G. C. Lewis said that he had not yet been able to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion on the subject; but it is very clear that if the present scale of costs be allowed for a few years longer, the useless formalities of quarter sessions and gaol deliveries, police and prisons, may be dispensed with altogether, and thus a further saving to the country be effected. Everybody now who is injured by, or whose duty it is to detect crime, has an interest in hushing it up, and in allowing the delinquent to escape. It is not very likely that any man who has prosecuted once will prosecute again, or that any witness who has once been at sessions or assizes will go there again, if they can help it; and it requires a very strong professional interest in a policeman who has once been at the assizes to do anything which may require his attendance there a second time. No wonder, then, that criminal justice should now not only be often blind, but also lame and dumb. A very short continuance of the present system is required to reduce her to helpless decrepitude.

The South Australian Advertiser of the 26th December last contains the report of a case (Hayne v. Dench), which has excited great commotion in the colony. The decision, which is one of the Supreme Court, has upset hundreds of titles that had been supposed to be perfectly good under the Torrens' Registration Acts. This misadventure is attributed by Australian journalists to two contradictory causes—one being the faulty construction of the Acts; and the other the misconstruction of them by the Court. It is not our business to decide which of these theories may be correct, as we only advert to the matter to show that grave difficulties have arisen in the working of this attempt to simplify the system of real property by registration of titles. But the case of Hayne v. Dench has not only thrown discredit upon Torrens' Acts; it has also raised the very important question, whether there is any Court of Appeal in the colony from the decisions of the Supreme Court. The defeated party wished to appeal to the Executive Council, of which Mr. Torrens is a member, and which has hitherto sat as a Court of Appeal; but the counsel for the successful litigant argued that the Executive Council no longer existed, and that the only appeal was to the Privy Council here. The Supreme Court, however, decided against the right to appeal in the present case on other grounds, although one of the judges at the same time said, that he had no hesitation at all in saying that there was no Court of Appeal in the province. From the facts which we have mentioned, it really does not appear that the results of recent South Australian legislation have been so successful as to entitle it to any very high degree of confidence as a model for our imitation.

The Queen has appointed the Duke of Argyll, Lord Kingsdown, Sir George Grey, Bart., Robert Wigram Crawford, Esq., Pearce William Rogers, Esq., William George Anderson, Esq., William Strickland Cookson, Esq., and Edwin Wilkins Field, Esq., to be her Majesty's Commissioners to inquire into the constitution of the accountant-general's department of the Court of Chancery, and the provisions for the custody and management of the funds of the court.

THE RECENT LAW EXAMINATION.

The result of the last examination of articled clerks has been hardly less surprising to the professional public, than to the twenty-eight young gentlemen who were unfortunate enough to be plucked. Although there are no statistical returns showing the averages of unsuccessful candidates for university degrees—which may be considered in many respects analogous to the certificates of the Incorporated Law Society—some acquaintance with the subject enables us to say that, at the universities, nothing approaching an average of 25 per cent. of rejected candidates has ever been known. At the recent examination in Chancery-lane, 28 out of 105 articled clerks failed to pass. With one or two exceptions, this is the highest proportion of failures recorded at the Law Institution. The fact itself requires explanation; and as it falls peculiarly within our province, we desire to offer some observations upon it.

The first thought that strikes the mind of an inquirer is, that a solution of the question can only be found in one of two directions. Either the examination, or the persons examined, must have been at fault. If we assume that the former was a fair test of what is required of legal practitioners, then the number of those who failed in meeting it proves either that the profession of the law is vastly more difficult than any other calling in life, or that the class of persons who become articled clerks are relatively less fit than any other class of students for the professions which they have respectively chosen—a conclusion which no one will entertain for a moment. But although, in respect of natural ability and general education, articled clerks are as well fitted as any other class of students for their intended profession; yet the question remains, whether—taking the examinations to be only the fair and requisite test of competency—the preliminary training is sufficient to enable candidates of ordinary industry and ability so to prepare themselves as to ensure a reasonable certainty of passing? Upon the other hand, it is to be considered whether the examination is precisely what it ought to be; whether the questions are generally such as that inability to answer them would be just ground of exclusion from the profession; whether, in short, those who exhibit a moderate acquaintance with the subjects to which the questions relate, and no others, ought to be admitted to the practice of a lawyer?

We have assumed that no adequate explanation can be found in the general character of the class of articled clerks. Perhaps we need hardly call this an assumption; for it is well known that as a body, they are characterized by good education and more than usual intelligence. Not a few of them are young men fresh from the public schools or the universities; and most of them are selected for the profession of the law, because, in the opinion of their friends at all events, they are persons of more than ordinary capacity and acuteness. It is obvious, therefore, that either the examination is not a proper test, or that these young men have not a fair opportunity of preparing themselves for it. We have long been of the opinion that both these statements are correct. If then the Incorporated Law Society desires to adopt any remedy, we would urge upon that body the importance of attending to both the considerations to which we have just now been adverting.

In the first place, we say that the examinations themselves are not what they ought to be. They are frequently such as would be very troublesome to competent lawyers, while to a great extent they are promotive of the system of cramming. By this process alone can any student hope to be prepared for a large number of the questions ordinarily to be found in the papers; while one who has been successfully crammed, and who therefore passes even with eclat, may nevertheless be but poorly qualified to discharge the duties incidental to the practice of a lawyer. Turning for a moment to the questions of Hilary Term, we find that there were only fourteen devoted to conveyancing. Of these the first three referred to Lord Cranworth's and Lord St. Leonards' Acts of last session; the fourth involved a point on which the authorities are extremely conflicting and unsatisfactory; and of the remainder we can only say that to our minds they would be better calculated for an examination of conveyancing counsel to the Court of Chancery than of young men desiring to become solicitors. We have no hesitation in asserting that there are many practitioners in large business, and not a few respectable conveyancers in Lincoln's-inn, who would find some difficulty in giving satisfactory off-hand opinions upon the questions put by the examiner on conveyancing last Hilary Term. They are, no doubt, very ingenious, and well fitted to probe and exhaust the information of advanced lawyers, whose minds are conversant with the particular topics touched upon. All that we contend for is, that they were not suitable under the circumstances. It is unreasonable to expect that articled clerks should be able to handle even in a passable manner some of the most difficult problems of real property law. On the other hand, a good Coach would have no great difficulty, if you give him time enough, to prepare his pupils so as to be able to pass through such an ordeal; although probably he would not pretend that they would be, in fact, much the better for it. If this be so, an examination of this kind is faulty, not only in aiming too high, but also in not reaching sufficiently low. Young men who, by artificial training, could be coached so as to answer these abstruse questions might likely enough be but poor hands in drawing a simple will or deed: the contrary also—namely, that those who could not pass such an examination might nevertheless be competent for ordinary practice—is equally true. Upon these grounds we cannot help being of opinion that the examinations in Chancery-lane are not always a fair test of the practical capacity of articled clerks; and that this fact goes far to account for the number of men who were last term sent back disconsolate from the Hall of the Law Society.

We do not wish, however, to be considered as suggesting that any mere change in the subjects or method of the examination will sufficiently meet the evil complained of. There cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that any single examination is sufficient—unless indeed it be far too severe—to ascertain the competency of candidates for any profession. There ought at least to be some preliminary test, or matriculation, without which the student would not be permitted authoritatively to enter upon his course of study. Such an arrangement would not only ensure the advantage of having the same starting point for the whole body, and of excluding those who were manifestly unfit; but it would enable the authorities to restrict their subsequent examinations to certain branches of the law, a moderate acquaintance with any one of which would be no contemptible attainment for a young man during his articles. We have the sanction of the greatest name for saying that sound knowledge is to be acquired only gradatim et continenter. It is too much to expect that young students can learn all that is required of them in a few months before the examination, or remember with sufficient distinctness what they had read some years before. There ought, then, to be not only a compulsory entrance examination, but at least, two other examinations during articles, which might, however, be of a less formal and rigid character. Students would then be able to pass in different departments of the law at different periods, and so to obtain a sounder and more general acquaintance with its entire domain.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn,
Barrister-at-law.

VI. (Continued).

COMPULSORY DOMICIL.

The case of an exile, or in our parlance a transported convict, would be different from the case of a servant travelling with his master, because, although only exiled his native country for a specified term, he might be transported to such a distance, and under such circumstances, as to render it morally impossible, having regard to his age, health, means, &c., that he should ever return. This, I apprehend, would seriously affect the question of his domicil, for the mere animus revertendi, however strong, would be entirely neutralized by such a state of things, and I know of no case which goes so far as to decide in direct terms that the domicil of origin in such a case would not be entirely lost: upon principle, I think it would.* Transportation, we know, is often followed by imprisonment also, in the distant colony to which the convict is transported, and in like manner a convict, though transported by sentence, is frequently retained in this country and kept in durance instead; but there is one consideration which is now of considerable importance, as it is a new element in this branch of legislation; namely, the tickets of leave which are so constantly and commonly granted to those under sentence, supposing their conduct has been thought to deserve such a remission of the punishment. This, of course, would very much assist the idea of the existence of the animus revertendi, and it would therefore take strong circumstances to counterbalance its influence, and allow this animus to be displaced, and its room filled by the animus manendi. In the case of imprisonment in a penal colony, slight provocation, a thing which would otherwise be little more than a fault, is elevated upon the top, as it were, of former transgressions, and the unfortunate being who is transferred to the mines of Port Arthur has little to hope for the future. The word "exile" is not exactly ours, because it rather belongs to the government of an autocracy, but as it is usually for life it has been considered to deprive the party exiled of his domicil of origin, Deniaart, Domiciles, 3. In the case of Duncan v. Cannan, 24 L. J. N. S. Chanc. 460, it was laid down in argument and confirmed by the decision of the Court, that questions of personal capacity in cases of minority, coverture, &c., were governed by the law of the actual domicil at the time when any dealing with the property was attempted, and not by that of the contract of acquisition; and this rule has been applied to a wife's equity to a settlement. In all these cases any particular law may by contract be substituted for that which would otherwise govern; Story, "Confli. of Laws," ss. 86, 69, 101, 102, 136, 141; Gambier v. Gambier, 7 Sim. 263, and 4 L. J. N. S. Ch. 81; Foubert v. Turst, 1 Bro. P. C. 129; Lashley v. Hogg, Rob. Pers. Succ. 414, 426; Galpratte v. Young, 4 De Gex. & Sm. 217; Frazer, on "Per. and Domest. Relat.," 1—417; Brandon v. Brandon, 3 Swanst. 312. Lord Justice

Knight Bruce, in the case above referred to (Duncan v. Cannan) observed, that the domicil at the time of the contract and at the time of the marriage, might be material, not so the subsequent domicil.

Amongst the cases of compulsory domicil those of a student and an emigrant are usually and not improperly classed. The former of these can hardly be considered as necessary to comment upon, inasmuch as a student can only be such for a very brief period, extending to a year or two at the most, and generally in this country, and even where, as is not uncommon, young men are sent to foreign seminaries or universities, they do not thereby lose their original domicil, because there must always be the strongest presumption that they will return to their native country when the purpose for which they left it is answered. The case of an emigrant is somewhat different, as of course, a man may leave his native country and settle in another in such a manner as to lose his native domicil and acquire a foreign one; but in the case of enforced emigration, of course the domicil of origin is not thereby necessarily lost. De Bonneval v. De Bonneval, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 856.

The only other case of compulsory domicil is that of a lunatic, which I proceed to consider. Lunatics are of two kinds, those who have always been so, either as idiots or violently insane persons, and those who have suddenly become so. It may be that in the former case, up to a certain point, although totally incapable of managing their affairs persons of weak intellect have still filled some sort of status, legally speaking, because there has been no inquisition found respecting them, and I apprehend if any such died, without inquisition found, inasmuch as their property could be inherited, the ordinary principles would apply with respect to them, as in the case of a sane person. The moment, however, the law takes cognizance of them, and some person is appointed as a medium to deal with, they are in the same position as any other party under disability, and the domicil of the committee would be theirs, in the same manner as the domicil of a guardian would be that of his ward, or of a husband that of his wife. The 108th article of the Code Civile uses the word tuteur, signifying very much the same thing as our tutor, that is, one to guard or render the object of his care safe (from tutus). There is a very early case on this subject, which is referred to in Robertson, on "Personal Succession," pp. 113 and 114, and also in Doctor Phillimore's Treatise on Domicil. This is found in the Dictionary of Decisions for 1813, by Lord Elchies; art. "Idiotry and Furology," No. 2; also, same volume, notes 199, 1749, June 21, where we have the following case:—George Morison, lunatic, and Walter Bain, and Penelope, his wife, committee of his estate, and John Hamilton their factor v. The Earl of Sutherland. A man by inquisition being found in England lunatic, thereupon a commission of lunacy was given by the Court of Chancery, and the committee of his estate, having suit for the debt owing the lunatic in Scotland, it was objected that a commission by the Lord Chancellor of England out of the Court of Chancery could give no title to sue in Scotland, and the committee after advising with counsel in England, finding that an idiot's tutor appointed in Scotland could not on that title maintain an action in England, and being therefore doubtful that the law might be found the same in Scotland applied to the Chancellor for leave to take a letter of attorney for the lunatic, which having got, he insisted on both titles; but the Court found that neither of them was a sufficient title to carry on the suit. Reversed by the House of Lords 13th February, 1750, and the title to give action in the appellant Morison's name. The Chancellor thought the objection to the first suit well founded, and that a committee in England could not sue in Scotland, but that yet the lunatic might sue in his own name, and that though the first suit was brought in the name of the committee, as if a lunatic, which they could not do in Scotland when the suit was afterwards brought in the lunatic's own, which could take no notice of his lunacy unless a brieve (inquisition) had issued (supposing he had been found furious), if they did take notice of it, it could only be as lunatic at large which could not bar a suit in his name, and that the union made no difference, for that the law would be the same in England. At page 109 of the notes is the following:—1st. Inquisition in England is no legal evidence in Scotland. 2ndly. If it was, the Lord Chancellor has no power to direct the management of an estate of his in Scotland, because extra territorium: answered that statuta personalia voce domicilii must bind everywhere. A lunatic or fatuous person or minor or married person who is held so there must be held so everywhere. Moveable sequuntur personam, and are regulated by the law of the place of domicile. Replied: statuta even personalia have no force extra territorium if it is not ex comitate. A man is major (i.e. of age) in Naples at eighteen, but if he had an estate in Scotland he could not dispose of it to the second in succession to moveables in Scotland, as ruled by the law of Scotland wherever the owner dies. Witness the case of Duncan's executors, same vol., tit. Succession, No. 4, 1738, February 16. The debts must be regulated by the law of the place where they must be sued.

Duncan's executors was this case. The nearest of kin of Adam Duncan competing the Lords thought that the succession to moveables and debts in Scotland and the office of executor must be regulated by the law of Scotland, and not by the law of the place where the deceased proprietor had his residence and died. They did not decide the point, but Adam Duncan who had his residence forty years in Holland having died there, the commissaries of Edinburgh preferred (as the Scotch term it) James and Ann Duncan, his brother and sister, to the office of executors. His nephews and nieces by other brothers and sisters presented an advocacy upon iniquity (that is put in their claim), for that by the law of Scotland they, jure representationis, had an equal right in the succession of the moveables as well as heritage. The Lords refused the bill, reserving to them to be afterwards heard upon their right to the succession of accords, and gave their opinion as above. It will be seen that the above cases refer chiefly to the question of jurisdiction which determines the domicile, and there are observations incidentally mingled with the facts and details, clearly showing the light in which a lunatic's status was regarded in Scotland. The Lord Chancellor's opinion was, that a lunatic might sue in his own name where his committee could not, by reason of the non-extent of the jurisdiction; but this was an enunciation of English law, as evidently appears by the next sentence; for it is stated in express terms that a lunatic, found what is called "furious," could not sue; but that if at large, his being lunatic as a mere fact was not sufficient to bar any suit by him; in other words, as I said at the beginning, the same principles apply to a lunatic before he is legally found so, as apply to a sane person not under any disability; for, in common parlance, we must bring a man within the pale of the law before the law can touch him. There is also a most important sentence at the conclusion of the case, namely, "and that the union made no difference, for that the law would be the same in England." In the same case as set forth in Lord Elchies' notes we are favoured with the heads of arguments, after stating the two propositions which he considered as laid down in the case, namely, that inquisition in England was no legal evidence (of lunacy) in Scotland, and secondly, if it was, the Lord Chancellor had no power to direct the management of such lunatic's estate in Scotland, because extra territorium, that is he had not the jurisdiction. The arguments were these; that the laws relating to personalty in the place of domicile must bind everywhere, and therefore that a lunatic or indeed any person so regarded in the place of his domicile must be taken to fill that character everywhere, and the incidents must follow. The reason given is that moveables sequuntur personam, and are regulated by the law of the place of domicile. This was denied on the ground that moveables were regulated by the law of Scotland wherever the owner dies (which would of course include a domicile), and in proof of this the case of Duncan's executors given above was referred to, which certainly appears so to decide. It is almost unnecessary to say that this is just the contrary to the law of England, and goes upon the principle that debts must be regulated by the law of the land where they must be recovered. Other instances, perhaps, of domicile not of choice, might be adduced, but it is scarcely necessary to refer particularly to them, because, as I have so often said, the principles, once known, we have nothing to do but to apply them. Thus a person having a temporary residence does not lose his domicile of origin or that which he before possessed; whereas the taking up a permanent sojourn immediately confers one, and this applies to clerical as well as lay persons, and the distinction between a curate and a beneficed clergyman is immediately apparent; a bishop in his palace and a clergyman in his living stand on the same footing, and though each may have translation or further preferment, the domicile acquired is not lost until another be gained, and in all cases where the sedes is, there will the domicile be likewise. With regard to those of the clerical profession also, there is this simplifying circumstance, namely, that their movements are usually within the English territory, except in the case of Scotch church as given to English clergymen or vice versa or colonial bishoprics. There of course, the actual acceptance of the preferment followed by the act of going to and taking possession of it, would, I think there is no doubt, operate as a loss of one domicile and the acquirement of another, and it is no proof of the fallacy of this assertion to say that there is the chance of a further and better piece of preferment, inducing the party immediately to leave the domicile so acquired and obtain perhaps a new one; for in the cases supposed there are all the elements necessary, and we look no further, whatever else may take place, to alter the domicile, being in the balance as the uncertain future against the certain present.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY.)

Feb. 15.—In re Smith.—This was a petition, and raised the important question whether a solicitor, who had formerly acted in a suit, but who had been removed by an order to change solicitors, was disentitled, on the mere ground of delay, which it was alleged there had been, in the prosecution of the suit, to his lien for costs. Several solicitors had been employed in the suit, and the right to costs of the last solicitor had been assigned to the petitioner, and the petition was presented to establish his lien for costs up to the time when solicitors were changed.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the petitioner was entitled to what he asked. It was not a universal rule that unless a solicitor prosecuted a cause to a decree, he was not entitled to have his costs, properly incurred. If, indeed, at an imminent or inconvenient time he deserted his client, and loss was incurred, that might be a ground to disentitle him to costs.

SPRING ASSIZES.—NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

LANCASTER.

This Circuit commenced on Saturday, the 16th inst. The learned judges, Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice Keating, arrived here on Saturday afternoon, and opened the commission. Their lordships attended Divine Service on Sunday at the parish church.

Feb. 18.—This morning Mr. Justice Hill charged the grand jury in the Criminal Court, and Mr. Justice Keating took his seat on the Civil side.

The cause list contained an entry and four causes, of which two were marked for special juries.

CROWN COURT.

(Before Mr. Justice HILL.)

Owing to the delay on the part of the grand jury in bringing in the bills, it was 3 o'clock before his lordship was able to try any prisoner.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Feb. 18.—The February adjourned sessions commenced this morning, at Clerkenwell, before Mr. W. H. Bodkin, assistant-judge; Mr. Payne, deputy; and a full bench of magistrates.

The calendar was heavier than usual.

(Before Mr. PAYNE.)

Feb. 20.—The grand jury was discharged about mid-day.

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE in his address to them said, he had long been of opinion, and had frequently expressed it, that the attendance of grand juries at the metropolitan courts had become entirely useless. The cases which were submitted to them were almost without an exception cases which had been previously investigated by the magistrates of the police-courts in their several districts,—gentlemen of great legal knowledge and experience, who, having found that a prima facie case had been established before them, sent the person accused for trial, and the grand jury was scarcely called upon to say whether they concurred in the judgment the magistrates had arrived at.

Mr. J. Fraser Macqueen has, in consequence of his elevation to the rank of Queen's Counsel, resigned his appointment as Revising Barrister for the metropolitan boroughs and the city of Westminster. The other two metropolitan revising barristerships are by the deaths of Mr. Lancelot Shadwell and Mr. Young Mc Christie, also vacant. These appointments are in the gift of the Lord Chief Justice, and are the only revising barristerships given to the chancery bar.

Shortly after the commencement of business in the Marylebone Police-court on Thursday, it was rumoured that Mr. Secker, who for many weeks had been unable to perform his duty owing to indisposition, had expired. His colleague, Mr. Mansfield, upon receiving the information, directed Burrage, one of the warrant officers, to proceed at once to Mr. Secker's chambers, Essex-court, Temple, to ascertain whether the rumour was correct or not. He did so, and on his return stated that the much lamented gentleman expired at half-past five o'clock on the previous morning. It is a remarkable circumstance that within the last eight or nine months death has claimed no fewer than three of the Marylebone magistrates, viz., Mr. Broughton, Mr. Hammill, and the one whose dissolution we have now the sad duty to record.

The following gentlemen have been appointed Queen's Counsel:—Mr. William Dugmore, Mr. W. A. Collins, Mr. A. Cleasby, Mr. H. W. Cole, Mr. John Fraser Macqueen, Mr. Thomas Chambers, Mr. E. Plumer Price, Mr. Josiah W. Smith, Mr. Richard Baggallay, Mr. Henry Mills, Hon. Adolphus F. O. Liddell, Mr. W. Baliol Brett, Mr. John Burgess Karlake, Mr. W. Digby Seymour, Mr. John Duke Coleridge; Hon. George Denman, and Mr. George Mellish. A patent of precedence has been conferred on Mr. Serjeant Hayes.

John Forster, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, late Secretary to the Commission, has been appointed a Commissioner in Lunacy; on the resignation of Bryan Waller Procter, Esq.

Mr. John Robert Griffith, of Llanrwst, Denbigh, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery.

Mr. John Leach, of Martock, Somerset, has been appointed perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds by married women for the county of Somerset.

Parliament and Legislation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, Feb. 15.

THE CONCENTRATION OF THE LAW COURTS.

LORD ST. LEONARDS: The question was whether their lordships would sanction the taking the sum of £1,400,000 belonging to suitors, for courts which they did not require. Some of the judges were sufficiently accommodated. The only accommodation required was for the two new Vice-Chancellors. The Society of Lincoln's Inn would build new courts at an expense to themselves of £100,000.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The suitors fee fund now amounted to about two millions and a half, and might properly be applied for the purpose required.

LORD CRANWORTH disagreed with the views entertained by Lord St. Leonards.

Monday, Feb. 18.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of Lord St. LEONARDS, this Bill was read a second time.

COURT OF DIVORCE.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR gave notice that on an early day he should move for a select committee to inquire into the law affecting the parties entitled to sue in the Divorce Court or the Sessions Court of Scotland for a dissolution of marriage.

Thursday, Feb. 21.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICES AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, Feb. 15.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.

MR. COWPER (in answer to Sir J. Shelley) stated that a Bill was in preparation for purchasing the site on which the new courts of law were to be erected. He hoped to be able to introduce the measure shortly.

MR. TURNBULL'S CASE.

MR. STIRLING moved an address for a copy of all letters and minutes which have passed between the Government and the Master of the Rolls relative to Mr. Turnbull's appointment and resignation; together with all such letters and minutes as relate to the regulations under which the work of calendaring is pursued, and the means taken for securing the integrity of the public papers.

Agreed to.

Monday, Feb. 18.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

The clauses as to salaries having been agreed to in committee the House went into committee on the Bill itself.

After some discussion the clause appointing a chief judge was agreed to. During the discussion Mr. Henley observed that as the Master of the Rolls and Vice Chancellors appeared to have little to do, the functions of the chief judge might be performed by one of those judges. The Attorney-General explained the present position of the equity courts, and stated that the manifold duties of the new judge would require all his time.

The clauses down to the 49th, excepting two or three which were postponed, were agreed to. On arriving at the 50th clause the chairman was ordered to report progress.

HIGHWAYS BILL.

The order for the second reading of this Bill was postponed till Friday.

Tuesday, Feb. 19.

REAL PROPERTY.

MR. W. WILLIAMS moved a resolution. "That in the opinion of this House, real property should be made to pay the same probate duty as that now payable on personal property." He stated at some length his reasons why the distinction at present existing between the two classes of property should no longer continue.

Mr. HADFIELD seconded the motion.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER opposed the motion, and said his views upon the subject were entirely opposite to those of Mr. Williams. The proposition was neither just nor practicable. The adoption of the motion would lead to a greater anomaly than that it proposed to rectify. To get one per cent. on land it would cost two or three per cent. to obtain a valuation of it. According to the best estimate that can be obtained, four-fifths of the land of this country is under settlement and entail, and the greater portion of it would escape the proposed probate duty.

Mr. WILLIAMS having replied, the House divided, and the numbers were:—

For the motion	51
Against it	167

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY.

The report of the committee on this Bill was brought up and agreed to.

Thursday, Feb. 21.

ALLOWANCES TO WITNESSES.

Mr. A. EORTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he was prepared to alter the present scale of allowances to witnesses at sessions and assizes.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said, he had received deputations from South Lancashire and the West Riding composed of gentlemen of great weight and experience in their own counties, whose object was to represent the inadequacy of the present allowances to witnesses at assizes and sessions. These expenses, however, were defrayed by a grant of that House, and any increase in the allowance would fall as a burden on the public exchequer. The subject was one of great difficulty, whether considered as leading to a general increase of allowances, or to a variable scale involving different rates in different counties, and he could not say that he had been able yet to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The House having resolved itself into committee resumed the consideration of the clauses of this Bill. Clauses 50 to 80 inclusive were agreed to with some slight amendments.

Clause 81, which abolishes the distinction between traders and non-traders was, after some discussion, agreed to.

Clause 82, which assimilates the law applicable to the two classes of debtors, gave rise to considerable discussion, in which Sir H. Cairns, Sir G. Bowyer, Mr. Malins, Mr. E. James, Sir F. Kelly, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Rolt, and the Attorney-General took part. The clause was eventually agreed to.

On reaching the 117th clause, which was agreed to, the chairman was ordered to report progress.

Persons subject to the Act.

All debtors, whether traders or not, may be adjudged bankrupt.

A non-trader who shall, to defeat his creditors, depart the realm, or remain abroad, or make a fraudulent conveyance of his estate, is to be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy.

The following rules to be observed with respect to non-trader departing the realm, viz.:—

1. The Court, upon satisfactory evidence, to order copy of petition to be served on him.

2. Order is to limit time for appearance.

3. If place of abode cannot be ascertained, petition may be served at last known place of residence, and not less than sixty days to be given from time of service for hearing.

4. After expiration of sixty days, if debtor does not appear, he may be adjudged bankrupt.

Lying in prison for fourteen days, escaping out of prison, and filing a declaration of insolvency, to be deemed acts of bankruptcy.

Trader debtor suffering execution to be levied for demand exceeding £50, to be deemed to have committed act of bankruptcy. If petition for adjudication not presented in meantime, sheriff may proceed with execution.

Goods taken in execution to be sold by auction.

Summons to be served personally when debtor in England, except otherwise ordered; where debtor not in England as court may order.

Duplicate summons to be delivered to sheriff.

Where service cannot be personally made, court may order notices to be inserted in Gazette and newspapers fixing time for debtor to appear.

Upon appearance debtor may be examined on oath, and to make discovery respecting his property. Debtor refusing to be sworn, or to make discovery, may be committed.

If after service of summons or notice thereof, debt not paid or secured, Court may adjudge him bankrupt without petition.

Three days allowed to show cause against adjudication; upon cause shewn adjudication may be annulled; adjudication to become absolute at the end of time allowed, or judgment against cause shown.

Debtor refusing to conform, may be committed, (s.s. 88, 97.)

Non-Traders.

Proceedings to be by petition. After filing of petition bankrupt and his estate subject to law of bankruptcy.

Petition to be filed in court within district where debtor shall have carried on business for six months previous; but Court may order petition to be presented within any district; or may transfer petition to any district or county court.

Amount of petitioning creditors' debts to be as follows:—A single creditor, or two, or more being partners, £50 or upwards; two creditors, £70 or upwards; three, or more creditors, £100 or upwards. Creditors for sums not due, may petition, or join in petitioning.

Debts antecedent to Act shall not support petition for adjudication, against non-trader.

Where bankruptcy fraudulently or maliciously prosecuted, Court may order satisfaction to be made to bankrupt for damages sustained.

Public officer of co-partnership may present petition.

Debtor may himself petition.

Debtor petitioning to file schedule.

Where debtor petitions, and his debts do not exceed £300, if resident in metropolitan district, to file his petition in London Court. Where debts shall exceed £300, and debtor shall not be resident in metropolitan district, petition to be filed in district county court.

Debtor petitioning, if in prison, to give notice to gaoler of his intention.

If creditor does not obtain adjudication in three days, any other creditor may proceed.

In computing debts for the purpose of petition, sums due on mortgage, or other securities, to be reckoned after deducting value of property comprised therein; and interest and costs respecting such debts to be also reckoned.

Proceedings after adjudication, &c.

After adjudication, the official assignee is to take possession of the bankrupt's estate.

Majority in value of creditors may transfer proceedings to county court.

Upon appointment of creditors' assignee, powers of official assignee to cease; the former to audit accounts of the latter; the former to realise estate, except amounts of £10 and under.

Court may determine on all differences between assignee, creditors, or parties claiming under trust deed.

Nothing in Bill as to last examination or proof of debts requires particular notice.

The classification of certificates is to be abolished.

A majority of creditors may resolve after adjudication to wind-up estate out of court under deed of arrangement.

Deeds of arrangement.

Trust deeds for benefit of creditors to be valid if executed by three-fourths in value of them, and by trustees and the debtor's execution thereof attested by a solicitor; possession of the property comprised therein being given up to the trustees; there being also certain formalities of registration, &c.; after registration the Court is to have jurisdiction, and the debtor is to be protected.

The Bill also contains a set of what has been called dead men's clauses, providing for the distribution of the estates of deceased debtors.

There are also numerous clauses relating to evidence, notices, &c.; misdemeanours under the Act, &c.

A BILL INTITLED AN ACT FOR PROMOTING A REVISION OF THE STATUTE LAW BY REPEALING DIVERS ACTS AND PARTS OF ACTS WHICH HAVE CEASED TO BE IN FORCE.

Whereas, with a view to the revision of the statute law, and particularly to the preparation of an edition of the statutes comprising only enactments which are in force, it is expedient that divers Acts and parts of Acts which have ceased to be in force otherwise than by express and specific repeal, should be expressly and specifically repealed: and whereas the Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act have so ceased to be in force to the extent specified in the third column of the said schedule: be it therefore enacted, &c.

The Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act shall be repealed to the extent specified in the third column of the said schedule, except as to any operation already effected by, or Act done under, any enactment herein comprised, or as to any right, title, obligation, or liability already acquired or accrued under any such enactment.

There is a prefatory note as follows:—

The object of the notes in the fourth column is to show the grounds of the proposed repeals. Acts of modern date, which have ceased to be in force, without being the subject of express and specific repeal, may be regarded as divisible into—

1. Acts repealed in general terms (for example, by the repeal of "all Acts relating to the Revenue of Customs," as in 7 Geo. 4, c. 48, s. 52).
2. Acts virtually repealed.
3. Acts superseded (where a later Act effects the same purposes as an earlier one, and thus renders the retention of the earlier one useless).
4. Acts expired (that is, Acts which, having been originally temporary, have not been made permanent, or been kept in force by continuance).
5. Acts spent (that is, Acts exhausted or spent in operation at the moment of their first taking effect, or at some specified time, or on the doing of some Act authorised or required).

The present Bill deals only with Acts of the first three classes. Where, however, part of an Act intended to be dealt with in the present Bill is spent or expired, that part has not been excluded from the repeal. At the same time, it has only been considered necessary to show in the fourth column how the remaining parts of the Act are gone. And so, where part of an Act has been already expressly and specifically repealed, that part has not been excluded from the repeal by the present Bill. The fourth column will show how such a previous partial repeal has been effected, as well as how the remaining part of the Act is gone. In consequence of the adoption of this course, the repeals in this Bill are in the great majority of cases of "the whole" of each Act dealt with, instead of being merely repeals of "so much as is not expired," or "spent," or of "so much as is not already repealed." Such a sweeping repeal is convenient for many purposes, and more particularly for simplifying the entries which will have to be made in the revised edition of the statutes, to show how the Acts and parts of Acts omitted are gone.

The fourth column of the schedule (with this note) is intended to be struck out at a late stage of the Bill.

The schedule consists of 103 pages, of which the following entries (being the two first and two last) are by way of specimen:—

SCHEDULE.

Act.	Subject.	Extent of Repeal.
11 Geo. 3. c. 23.	Militia Pay	The whole - -	Repealed by 26 Geo. 3, c. 107, s. 135, in general terms; and the repealing Act is repealed by 42 Geo. 3, c. 90, s. 1, without a saving for repeals.
" c. 24.	Greenland and Whale Fishery.	The whole - -	Superseded by 31 Geo. 3, c. 43, s. 5.
16 & 17 Vict. c. 125.	Metropolitan Sewers Acts Continuance and Amendment.	The whole - -	Superseded. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, ss. 145 and 181.
19 & 20 Vict. c. 25.	Drafts on Bankers.	The whole - -	Semble, virtually repealed by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 79

CHARGE OF DEBTS—DIRECTION TO PAY DEBTS—IMPLIED POWER OF SALE.

Cook v. Dawson, M. R., 9 W. R. 305.

Every decision being important which tends to give stability to a disputed doctrine of law, we return briefly to this subject. A leading proposition laid down by Wood, V.C., in Hodkinson v. Quinn, 1 Johns. & H., 303; 9 W. R. 198, is this—that where a will contains such a direction to pay debts as amounts to a charge upon the real estate devised, and there is no distinct provision as to the person by whom the debts are to be paid, there is an implied power in the executors to enter into a contract for sale of the estates, whether the persons beneficially interested are concurring or opposing; and, if they resist, the executors can compel those who have the legal estate to join in the conveyance. This decision, which follows that of Robinson v. Lowwater, before the Lords Justices, 5 De G. M. & G. 272, affirming the Master of the Rolls, 17 Beav. 592, has been again judicially acted upon by the Master of the Rolls in Cook v. Dawson. In this case it was admitted by counsel on both sides that, notwithstanding the doubts which have been expressed by eminent authorities on the question, some statement of which may be found ante, p. 259—the principle is now placed beyond dispute.

A no less important point which was strongly contested in Cook v. Dawson was this—whether the direction to pay debts in that particular case amounted to a charge upon the real estate or not. The direction was that the debts should be "fully paid and satisfied by the executrix"—without specifying out of what fund; and the testator gave to his widow, whom he afterwards appointed his executrix, a life estate in the real property, and "if she found that the net rents and proceeds were inadequate and not sufficient for her proper maintenance and comfort," then a power to mortgage. After her death there was a devise over. The Master of the Rolls laid down the proposition that a general direction by a testator for the payment of his debts, amounts to a charge of his debts upon the real estate, at least where the property is afterwards disposed of by the will. To this rule there is a well-known exception in cases where, coupled with the direction that the debts shall be paid, there is another direction that they shall be paid by the executor. It was denied in the course of the argument that this old exception was still the law, but the Master of the Rolls, though with some apparent reluctance, felt bound to support the rule. He said that although he might have entertained doubts upon the question had it come before him for the first time, the doctrine was too firmly established to admit of its being disturbed by him. The direction in such a case must be held to extend only to charge that property which comes to the executor's hands in the ordinary way, viz., the personal estate. But this exception, continued the Master of the Rolls, is open to another exception, in cases where there is a "devise of land" to the executor. In those cases the direction that the debts shall be paid by the executor "does not affect the validity of the general charge of debts upon the real estate." It must be confessed that it is difficult to reconcile this rule with that laid down in Harris

v. Watkins (Kay, 438); the marginal note of which is this: "When a will contains a direction to the executors to pay the testator's debts, and then a devise of real estate to that executor, it is considered that the testator has imposed upon the executor the duty of paying the debts to the extent of the property given to him, and accordingly that property "is held to be charged with the debts," a statement which is fully borne out by the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wood, at p. 443. Whatever may be the solution of this apparent contradiction, it is to be observed that the decision in Cook v. Dawson went upon other grounds, viz., that, upon the construction of the will, the executrix took only a life estate in the lands, and that the power to mortgage did not include by implication a power of sale. The two cases which were relied on in favour of the right of the executrix to sell, were Finch v. Hattersley, 3 Russ. 345 (n), and Gosling v. Carter, 1 Coll. 644. In both there was a direction that debts should be paid by the executrix, and in both a life estate was given to her. But in the former case, all that appears from the report is a declaration that the real estates ought to be sold, &c., without specifying by whom; and in the second, the life estate given to the executrix was in the whole of the real and personal estate; and there appeared to the Court to be strong evidences of intention, from the wording of the particular will, that she should sell during her lifetime.

The results arrived at in Cook v. Dawson were these; that the direction above stated amounted to a charge of the debts upon the life estate of the executrix; and, there being no devise of the corpus of the real estate to the executrix, that the corpus of the real estate was not charged. Consequently the Court held, though with manifest reluctance, that the executrix could not make a good title to a purchaser.

COMMON LAW.

SALE OF GOODS—29 CAR. 2, c. 3, s. 17—WHAT IS A SUFFICIENT MEMORANDUM.

Bailey v. Sweeting, 9 W. R., C. P., 273.

We have it upon the authority of Mr. Justice Willea, that the particular question raised in this case has not before been the subject of judicial decision; and yet, if such be the fact, it is strange enough, for the dispute which arose between the parties in the present instance must be of very frequent occurrence. The point for decision may be put shortly thus: "Is the note or memorandum of a contract for the sale of goods for the price of £10 or upwards (required by the 17th section of the statute of frauds) sufficient to enable the vendor to maintain an action for their price, if such memorandum be given subsequently to the time when the sale took place, and if it contains in itself a repudiation of the vendee's liability on such contract?" Mr. Justice Blackburn, in his well-known treatise on the contract of sale, is of opinion that a memorandum containing a repudiation of liability, as well as the terms of the bargain, is not such as constitutes a sufficient compliance with the statute. He says (p. 66), that it sometimes happens that after a dispute has arisen, a party in a letter signed by him recapitulates the whole terms of the bargain, for the purpose of saying that the bargain is at an end; and that it has never been decided whether such an admission of the terms of the bargain, signed for the express purpose of repudiation, can be considered a memorandum to make the contract good. He adds, however, that in his own judgment it seems difficult on principle to see how it can be so considered: for the parties may, either of them, put an end to the contract at any time whilst it is not good, with cause or without cause; and a memorandum of the terms comes too late to make a contract good which is already put an end to by the will of one of them. Mr. Justice Blackburn concludes by saying, that he knows of only three cases in which the point could have been decided; and though in each of them the memorandum was held insufficient, yet that they seem all to have been decided on special grounds, irrespective of the question now under discussion. These cases are Cooper v. Smith (15 East. 103), Richards v. Porter (6 B. & C. 437), and Smith v. Surman (9 B. & C. 561); and of these, the first appears to have been decided in favour of the defendant, because the terms of the bargain were not correctly stated in the memorandum; the second, because the terms were not sufficiently specified; and the third, because they appeared from it to have been left undecided between the parties at the time of sale. But, though Mr. Justice Blackburn's opinion upon the point was strongly urged upon the Court in the present case, they decided nevertheless adversely to the defendant; and indeed, in express terms, held the passage above referred to, to be erroneous. "I am bound to say," said Mr. Justice Williams, "that I do not consider the reasons given in my brother Blackburn's book to be sufficient." The particular circumstances of the present case are not perhaps very material with regard to the general proposition of law now under consideration; but it may be mentioned that the question arose out of a sale of some goods which were injured in the carriage, and which the defendant consequently refused by letter to accept; reciting in such his refusal (unfortunately for himself, though probably out of extreme caution) the precise terms of the bargain which he had made with the vendor. This letter the Court held to have a retrospective effect, and thereby to supply the signed memorandum required by the statute, in order to allow the vendor to sue for the price of the goods; and they accordingly directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff.

CRIMINAL LAW.

APPROPRIATION OF FOUND GOODS, WHEN IT AMOUNTS TO LARCENY.

Reg. v. Moore, 9 W. R., C.C.R., 276.

This is the most recent of a series of cases which point out the fine distinctions which the law draws, in judging of the conduct of him who appropriates to his own use the chattel of another,—which by being accidentally lost, or otherwise, leaves for a time the possession of its owner, and comes into that of the finder. The law upon this subject was far from settled at the date of the last edition of Mr. Russell's well-known treatise upon "Crimes and Misdemeanours." That author (vol. ii. p. 11) says, that where the "taking" of goods from another is by finding the property, the crime of larceny is not committed, though there be animus furandi in the finder. Several illustrations of this proposition are given, and among them it is said that if one lose his goods in the highway, and another find them and carry them away with all the circumstances that usually prove a felonious intent—as denying or secreting the property—yet as the first taking was lawful, no larceny has been committed. It is true that Mr. Russell goes on to observe that this doctrine must be received with great limitation; and proceeds to give several cases in which the party who found and appropriated the goods of another, was convicted of stealing them: and he finally arrives at the conclusion, that the old rule does not apply, if the finder knows the owner of the property; or if there be any mark, or other circumstances from which the owner can be reasonably ascertained. He adds that in cases of this kind (inasmuch as, after all, the animus furandi is the gist of the matter) the jury should be always satisfied that the prisoner intended at the time of offending to convert the article to his own use, for if such intention only came into his mind subsequently, before he had an opportunity of restoration to the owner no larceny has been committed. But a chain of cases since the date of the last edition of Mr. Russell's work have now thrown some additional light upon this subject. The first of these was Thorburn's case (1 Den., C. C., 387), which expressly recognises the correctness of the qualification engrafted by Mr. Russell upon the ancient rule; and lays it down that, to be guilty of felony, the finder of an article must know who the owner is, or have reasonable means at the time of finding it, of knowing who he is; and this criterion was in effect adopted in the subsequent cases of The Queen v. Preston (21 L. J., M. C., 41), The Queen v. Dixon (25 L. J., M. C., 89), and The Queen v. Christopher (28 L. J., M. C., 35). But the present case shows that the criterion is not in all instances sufficient; for here, at the time the prisoner found the article, he neither knew the owner nor had he reasonable means of knowing who the owner was (for so the jury expressly found, in answer to a question from the judge); but yet inasmuch as he believed at the time of finding that the owner might be found, and intended, nevertheless, to appropriate the property to his own use, whoever the owner might turn out to be—the Court of Criminal Appeal held him to have been rightly convicted of larceny. The prosecutor had come to the prisoner's shop, and had there dropped a £10 note, which the prisoner appropriated and changed forthwith; he took it, intending, when he picked it up, to take it to his own use, and believing that the owner could be found, though without knowing till afterwards who he was; "but," said the Chief Justice, "if that be not larceny, our law would be in a much more defective state than I take it to be."

MOSE'S CASE.

Under this heading you have in your impression of the 16th inst. made some observations which, so far as they allude to my firm or me, are most unjust. As I had the conduct of the suit in question, and as I have to state my personal conviction in regard to facts of which my partner has no knowledge, I write on my own behalf, and not on that of my firm. Most deplorable as has been the end of poor Mr. Bailey, regard should be had to the statements made to me, upon which alone I could form an opinion. Of the nature and effect of those statements it is evident by your remarks you have been misinformed in several important particulars.

The grandfather of Mose by his will devised and bequeathed freehold, leasehold, and funded property. He may have laboured under a delusion. It was, and still is, my conviction that a grievous wrong was done to Mose's mother, who, under the will, was sole devisee and legatee. You observe that "Bailey expended his money in full expectation of the success of his suit." I pointed out to him, as was my duty, the risk he was incurring. The opinion of counsel was sent to him, making him fully aware of all the difficulties of the case arising chiefly from the Statute of Limitations, which, however, it was hoped, might not be available in a case of concealed fraud. On obtaining the first opinion of counsel I wrote to Mr. Bailey, on 29th November, 1859, thus:—"We send you copy of counsel's opinion, from which you will perceive that the Statute of Limitations is a bar to Mr. Mose's claim. The fraud of concealment is not, in counsel's judgment, such a legal, although a moral, fraud, as would induce a court of equity to restrain the defendant from setting up the Statute of Limitations. Under these circumstances it would be advisable not to proceed. We will, on your so informing us, remit you the money left with us, less our costs herein." Upon this Mr. Bailey and Mr. Mose came up to town, and at their urgent request I submitted the case to an eminent Queen's counsel. Of the opinion of this gentleman, which as to the Statute of Limitations was also adverse, I likewise sent Mr. Bailey a copy. This brought Mr. Bailey and Mr. Mose again to town, when Mr. Bailey urged me to proceed, notwithstanding these adverse opinions. He insisted that the defendant's answers and the production of the deeds would establish Mose's title. Counsel was also of opinion that time did not begin to run under the statute until the discovery of the fraud, which, according to the statements made to me, was within twenty years. I further pointed out to Mr. Bailey the difficulty he had to encounter arising from the non-identification of the property and the absence of evidence. In a letter read at the inquest, dated the 2nd of March, 1860 (before filing the bill), I wrote Bailey thus:—"In a former letter of ours to you we advised the necessity of your ascertaining where the property was situated and of what it consisted before incurring the expense of a Chancery suit. We can only again reiterate that advice. With regard to the Statute of Limitations, you felt disposed, notwithstanding counsel's opinion to the contrary, to institute the suit and take the opinion of the Court upon it if the point should be raised by the defendants, and so far we think the risk is worth running; but a more important question has to be considered: What are you fighting for? where is the property? Suppose you had at this moment a decree in your favour, of what are you going to take possession?" Bailey and Mose again came to town, and Mr. Bailey still insisted that a suit should be instituted, when I, influenced by his urgent entreaties, consented to carry the matter as far as the coming in of the answers; at the same time I distinctly informed him that unless evidence of title were thereby elicited it would be out of the question to proceed further, and that he would have not only to bear his own but to pay the defendants' costs of the suit. When the answers came in, and I had obtained a sight of the deeds, I refused to proceed further. Mr. Bailey, however, was determined to prosecute the suit to a hearing, and instructed another solicitor to act for him. With this gentleman I had several interviews, and it was arranged that I should deliver to him the papers in the suit on his obtaining the usual order to change solicitors, which but for poor Bailey's death would have been done. You state that Bailey had been assured when he took up the case that he "would have nothing to pay, and that the other parties would have all to pay." I have shown that I gave no such assurance, but the contrary. The risk he incurred was clearly explained to him, and brought prominently before him. These facts, together with the applications to him for money as the suit proceeded, clearly ignore that he could have formed such belief as the result of any communication from me. I have referred to the report of the inquest, and cannot discover the expression of indignation you state the coroner to have made; on the contrary, the coroner, with the opinions of counsel and the letters before him, observed "the letters are most clear." It was in evidence that counsel's opinion stated that, "under existing circumstances, he did not see it possible to prosecute the suit with the remotest chance of success;" and yet "Bailey and his wife were anxious to go on with the case," and that Bailey, so far from being alarmed by the expense he had already incurred, said, "If he had £500 more he would go on with it." I must notice one other point. It transpired on the inquest (though at first denied by Mose) that there was an agreement between him and Bailey to divide the profits. Of this I had not the most remote knowledge until I read the account of the inquest. Bailey was suing as assignee of Mose and the property recovered would therefore, in the first instance, belong to Mose's creditors. There are other mis-statements in your article, one of which relates to the answers in the former suit. The material defendants put in no answer, but a mere plea, alleging the bankruptcy of Mose. One defendant alone, who ought not to have been made a party, answered, and he stated his ignorance of the facts charged. With Mr. Torr, of the firm of Sudlow & Co., the solicitors for the principal defendants, I conferred several times before the institution of the suit. He informed me that he had shown the title deeds to third parties, and that they were satisfied Mose had no claim to the property in question, to which I replied that production to a third party was not satisfactory, but that if he would permit me to inspect the deeds, and I was satisfied that Mose had no claim under them, I would not institute the suit. This he refused to do, but again offered to produce them to any third party to be agreed on. My reply was, "you may produce the title deeds to Black Acre, but I want to see the title deeds relating to White Acre." He still declined to allow me personally to inspect them, and the suit of necessity proceeded. The answers of the defendants were excepted to, and set down for hearing. Upon that occasion, my junior counsel in reply to a remark made by the defendant's counsel, said, "that if the defendant's solicitors would permit the plaintiffs' solicitors to inspect the deeds, and they were satisfied the plaintiffs had no case, he would undertake that all further litigation should cease." This offer was not accepted, and the litigation proceeded. Some of the exceptions were allowed; others overruled. Further answers were put in, whereupon counsel advised an application at chambers for production and inspection of documents, which was made, and although opposed by the solicitors for both sets of defendants, granted. In due course the affidavits came in. That made by Mr. Torr's clients set up as privileged certain title deeds and documents set forth in a very long schedule to the affidavit which they refused to produce. Those as to which they did not claim privilege were too insignificant to be looked at—mere waste paper. I then applied for a copy of the affidavit made by Mr. Torr's clients, whereupon he on the 1st January last, wrote my firm as follows, "Dear Sirs.—Bailey v. Lamb.—We send herewith copy of our defendant's affidavit as to documents as desired, and beg to add that we have our client's permission to produce (notwithstanding the protection claimed in the affidavit) all such of the documents as throw light upon the title to the late Mr. John Lamb the younger's property, and you can commence the inspection at any time convenient to yourselves; to-day even if you like."—This was the first time I was offered an inspection. Had it been offered me before the commencement of this suit, the suit would never have been instituted by me. Whether Mr. Torr or his client is to blame, I leave them to settle between themselves.

As this letter is already too long, I will conclude by once more suggesting that the facts should be looked at as they were represented to me at the time, and not under the bias of the recent distressing event.—I am, Sir, your's obediently,
February 22. JNO. F. W. FESSEMYER.

[We have no desire to enter upon any controversy with the writer of this letter, as to the correctness of our impressions of what the opinion of the coroner and jury was. We should have no difficulty, however, in finding authority, in the report of the inquest, for what we said last week on this subject. Messrs. Sudlow, Torr, & Co., are at issue with Mr. Fessmeyer upon a much more material point, as will be seen by their letter to-day. But as it is the duty of journalists to be impartial, we think it right to abstain, for the present, from any further comment upon this case.—Ed. S. J.]

SIR.—The sympathy expressed in your leading article of last week in favour of the deceased plaintiff, Bailey, ought, we venture to suggest, to be extended also to our clients the unfortunate and much victimised defendants, who by reason of the plaintiff's suicide, are left to bear their own costs of the unnecessary and vexatious litigation which has been inflicted on them.

Our clients have been for many years harassed by claims made by Mose to property of which he alleged that his mother had been deprived by our clients' ancestors as long ago as the year 1773! Six solicitors in turn took up, and in succession abandoned, his case; and, in order to endeavour to put a stop to further annoyance we, in the year 1857, produced to the professional gentlemen who then interested themselves on Mose's behalf our clients' title deeds to the property in question, which shewed that our client's testator purchased the property more than thirty years subsequently to 1773; and further, that it never did belong to the ancestor under whom Mose claimed; and they advised Mose to that effect. We gave notice of the result of such production of the deeds to Bailey (or rather to Messrs. Grane & Fesenmeyer, his solicitors) last year, before he filed the present bill, referred them to the gentlemen who had previously inspected the deeds and offered again to produce the deeds to any competent disinterested third person whom we might mutually agree on. The offer was declined, the bill filed, and 190 folios of interrogatories administered to our clients. Our answer set out our title fully, and subsequently the plaintiff obtained a formal order for us to produce the deeds; and immediately his solicitors saw them, it appears from the proceedings on the inquest that they wrote to Bailey that he had better abandon his proceedings. He thereupon shoots himself and leaves the defendants to bear their own costs, for which, we fear, they have no remedy against his estate. The bill, as appears on the face of it, was filed without the approbation of the official assignee, who refused to become a co-plaintiff, and was accordingly made by Bailey, a defendant—a wise resolution, as it proves, on the part of the official assignee, who has thereby escaped liability to our clients' costs.

It is very hard on persons in the position of our clients (the defendants) to be exposed to such attacks, especially after they have produced their title deeds, and convinced the claimant's then advisers that his claim was without foundation; and it is surely a defect in the law that they should be left remediless as to the costs which they have sustained by reason of such vexatious and unwarrantable proceedings.—We are, sir, yours very obediently,

THE SOLICITORS' ACT, 1860.

The Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association have often drawn attention to the fact that many official appointments that properly belong to solicitors are filled by barristers. The 16th section is a fearful step in the direction of continuing this practice, as was pointed out in your columns long ago. Who was the author of this clause? I cannot find it in the original Bill. The annual meeting of both the above and the Law Institution will afford a proper opportunity for inquiry; and I hope it will be ascertained.

LORD ST. LEONARDS' BILL ON CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.

This Bill provides that a purchaser shall not be bound by constructive notice. In a former bill his lordship shaped the clause to the effect that a purchaser should not be bound by any other than actual notice; the clause now introduced is virtually the same, and the valuable remarks in your Journal of the 21st May, 1859, p. 542, equally apply. This remarkably short bill affords a marked instance of piecemeal legislation. It will materially affect the remedies of creditors, a class of persons with whom his lordship, apparently, has but little sympathy; the recent act on judgments has already limited the remedy of creditors, and the least that ought to be done for them should be that the registering of a judgment should be notice to a purchaser. There would then be one case in which the difficulty of what is and what is not a sufficient notice under the proposed Act would be defined.

Probably your influential journal will direct the attention of the profession to this bill.

I think the mortgagee's solicitor is quite right in refusing to accept of a mortgage framed under this Act, as any prudent mortgagee would prefer having the usual powers inserted in the mortgage deed to exercising those given by this Act, to the effect of which he knows little or nothing, and which may be materially affected or crippled by judicial decision. I am not aware that this Act dispenses with the necessity for covenants for title, and must suppose your correspondent refers to the Act of 8 & 9 Vic., c. 119, but surely he cannot consider it unreasonable for the mortgagee's solicitor to refuse to adopt that Act, it being practically a dead letter.

Your correspondent also greatly exaggerates the saving effected by adopting Lord Cranworth's Act. I have calculated that no more than fifteen folios is rendered unnecessary by it, and the costs of drawing and fair copy and engrossing this additional matter, together with stamp and parchment, is only £2 5s., and not £5 as stated by him.

ANOTHER PROVINCIAL SOLICITOR.

Liverpool, Feb. 19th.

In answer to the question of "A Provincial Solicitor," I would suggest that the remedy would be the taxation of the bill. How the taxing master or, ultimately, the Court, would decide the point your correspondent has raised is a matter of no little interest to the profession. If I could presume to offer an opinion, it would be that, as the adoption of the provisions of the Act is entirely optional they can only be used, and were only intended to be used, where parties agree to do so.

SHERIFF OF COUNTY AND M.P.

There would seem to be an answer to the objection your correspondent would urge against an M.P. being also sheriff and consequently judge of his own election, that the writ from the Crown Office in all such cases might go to the coroner. The ministerial office of the coroner is only as the sheriff's substitute; for when just exception can be taken to the sheriff for suspicion of partiality (as that he is interested in the suit), the process must then be awarded to the coroner instead of the sheriff for execution of the King's writs, 4 Inst. 271, Blac. Com. 349.

There being so many sages of the law in the Privy Council, it is difficult to imagine such a question would not occur to them or the officials of the Crown; and, again, the sheriff acts by his deputy at most of the elections for county.

J. R.

A sheriff is ineligible to sit in Parliament for the county of which he is sheriff, as also for any city or borough to which his precept extends. A returning officer is, in like manner, ineligible for the city or borough for which he acts. The 16 & 17 Vic., c. 68, does not appear to have altered the law of elections in this respect. Mr. May, however, seems to think that it has had this effect. The ground of this suggestion of his must be the change in the form of the writ effected by the Act. There is a principle, however, involved in such cases independently of the terms of the writ, and that principle is the rational one that no man is to be judge in his own cause. The sixth section of the Act of Settlement prohibits persons holding offices or places of profit under the Crown from being capable of sitting in the House of Commons. And this is doubtless the principle that is supposed by the non-professional public to incapacitate sheriffs from serving as members of Parliament. Their office, however, has not that personal relation to the Monarch which alone was contemplated by the Act of Settlement. The true reason is the one we have stated. The Scotch Reform Act, s. 36, excludes from Parliament every sheriff substitute, sheriff clerk, and deputy-sheriff clerk; also town clerks, and deputy town-clerks. There also sheriffs may sit for any other place than that to which their office belongs, the principle of exclusion being applicable only to their sphere of quasi-judicial jurisdiction.—Vide May's Law of Parliament, p. 33; Rogers on Elections M.

LANCASHIRE.—At the Bury County Court, on the 9th inst. the following case came on for hearing before J. Worlledge, Esq.:—Trudgett v. Parkington.—Mr. Walpole, solicitor, appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Salmon, solicitor, for the defendant.—The action was brought to recover the value of a hare. Trudgett was a miller at Stanton, and Parkington looked after the game for a gentleman named Loft, of Troston. Trudgett occupied a piece of land, upon which his mill stood, and this land ran directly into that of Mr. Loft. On the 29th of December Trudgett had some men carting muck, and he went with his dog to see the men at work, and the dog started a hare in Trudgett's field, and after running her across two or three fields and the high road she was killed on a piece of land in the occupation of Mr. Taylor, but belonging to Mr. Loft. Parkington then seized the hare which had been killed by Trudgett's dog and went to Trudgett and told him that he should hear more about it by and bye, and he summoned him before the magistrates, who dismissed the case. The question was whether under these circumstances Trudgett was not entitled to the hare. The judge said he had no doubt upon the case. The conversion of the hare complained of was taking it away from the dog, which he thought was justified under the 36th sec. 1 & 2 Wm. 4., and the judgment of the court must be for the defendant.

MANCHESTER.—At the annual meeting of the members of the Manchester Law Association, held on Friday the 15th inst. (Mr. Cobbett, president, in the chair,) after the reading of the report, Mr. Baker, the chairman of the committee for the past year, presented to Mr. Francis Marriott, on behalf of the association, a testimonial, consisting of an elegant silver salver, silver claret jug, and two silver goblets, the salver bearing an inscription acknowledging the valuable services of Mr. Marriott as honorary secretary for a period of six years.

Ireland.

THE PROFESSION AND THE LANDED ESTATES COURT.

The law of real property in Ireland resembling (except in a few unimportant details) that of England, it follows that the owner of land is at liberty to sell, or mortgage, or partition, or exchange it without having recourse to any court of justice whatever. The Court of Chancery maintains unimpaired its old jurisdiction; and claimants on land are still at liberty to institute suits for sale or foreclosure, and partition; suits may also be commenced as formerly. In short, the Landed Estates Court Act merely enables owners of and incumbrancers on land, to proceed, if they think fit, in that Court; and enables that Court, on proper applications being made and notices given, to sell, convey, partition, &c., and also to carry out contracts for sale. It is important to bear these facts in mind, when considering the place filled by this Court in the land system of the country. No petitioner comes in unwillingly, for he has the option of taking other means for effecting his object, whatever that may be. But the fact is (as already stated), that the solicitors, as a body, prefer to transact most of the business relating to land through the medium of the Court. The interests of their clients are, of course, the first object of their concern; but they are not uninfluenced by the fact that the rules of practice and the table of fees have been framed very much in accordance with the views of the Law Society, and without the slightest intention of either dispensing with the services of solicitors, or of denying them fair remuneration for their services. The estimate formed by the profession of the machinery provided by this Act is well shown by the increasing number of applications to the Court to execute contracts for sales of estates, and by the growing habit of inserting in such contracts a proviso that the Court shall be called into requisition for the purpose of carrying out the contract.

In point of fact, the Court assumes the functions of the conveyancing counsel rather than those of the solicitor, of course, with such enlarged powers as render this analogy a very imperfect one. Let a conveyancer be imagined, however, endowed with absolute power to call for and procure deeds or evidences of title from any custody—empowered peremptorily to require persons to put forward any claims that they may have—empowered to levy by sale all demands on the land, and enabled to clothe his orders and conveyances with the force of an Act of Parliament. Our imaginary conveyancer would soon have a complete monopoly of the business relating to land, for solicitors would, of course, recommend their clients to take advantage of his powers and skill.

Now, instead of this imaginary Brodie or Duval, possessed of novel and unlimited powers, there exists for Ireland a court consisting of a trio of conveyancing judges, clothed with so much of the jurisdiction of an equity court as is required, and into whose offices and chambers nearly all the current landed business of the country passes, almost as a matter of course, the larger part of it being, of of course, the administrative or non-contentious kind. The initiatory step is by "petition," instead of by "instructions;" and in lieu of all fees, a duty or per centage on the value of the property is levied for the purposes of revenue, all the expenses of the Court being in the first instance defrayed by Parliamentary votes. It appears from returns just compiled that exactly 50 per cent. of the petitions of all kinds proceed from the owners themselves, and it is computed that 30 per cent. more are "friendly" petitions; leaving a balance of 20 per cent., or one-fifth of the applications only, being adverse petitions by creditors of the estates. Instead of a creditor's court, as it was in the first years of its history, it has become a kind of land-exchange, and the judges may be regarded as conveyancers-general; and here the vendor and the purchaser, the owner and the incumbrancer, resort, as readily as people in search of Three per Cents. resort to the Stock Exchange, the transactions being managed in the former case by a solicitor and in the latter by a broker. It is not to be supposed, however, that the services of the Bar are entirely dispensed with. Counsel find consolation in drawing petitions, in revising abstracts, and in arguing matters of title where the Court is in doubt, or where some contention arises touching a tenancy, an easement, a boundary, an annuity, or touching conflicting claims upon an estate or a fund. This Court seems to us to have judiciously defined the province of counsel, where it declares in its rules of practice that counsel's attendance is to be allowed on taxation where "any matter requiring argument" has come before the Court.

It may be inquired, How is the general conveyancing business of the country affected by this system?

The answer is, that while titles are greatly simplified, transactions in land are very much increased in number. Abstracts are shortened, but conveyances and other deeds are multiplied. On a rough estimate, 3,300 estates have passed through the court since its first establishment; and these have been conveyed (in lots) by about 13,000 separate deeds of conveyance. If the court had never existed, it is believed that less than one-tenth of this number of conveyances of land in Ireland would in due course have been executed. The title of a purchaser under the court, is, of course, comparatively simple, as no inquiries are made beyond the date of the purchase. But considering the increased number of separate ownerships, and the increased facilities for buying and selling land, there is every reason for concluding that even apart from the mere conveyances to purchasers, the number of deeds executed relating to land, has largely increased. This is a point on which, from its very nature, statistics cannot be adduced, but the experience of the solicitors, and the increased business of the office for registering deeds, confirm the statement.

But as the court is in the Irish metropolis, how do solicitors residing in the country manage to conduct cases in it?

Every solicitor has an address in Dublin, where notices, &c., may be served on him, and this address is in fact, the office of his town agent. With the arrangements between the solicitor and his agent, the court has, of course, nothing to do; but it may be stated that a very common arrangement is, the payment to the latter of an annual allowance—in other words, country solicitors frequently pay a salary in lieu of half-fees to their town agents, and we may add—from some instances that we have heard of sometimes, a very small one. Costs "out of pocket," there are few, if any, as the ad valorem duty to Government (in lieu of court fees) is levied at the last stage of the proceedings. But to explain the matter more clearly. The proceedings in the Landed Estates Court are of such a nature that, except so far as more attendances at court are concerned, the solicitor conducting a case may reside in the far north, or the extreme south; yet so long as the documentary statements are sufficiently framed, and the documentary evidence complete, it matters little who attends to lodge the papers, and receive the direction of the Court thereon. It is evident that matters of title depend very little on the person who attends court or chambers, and very much on the written statements and proofs. A brief sketch of an ordinary case in the Landed Estates Court, conducted by a solicitor living in some provincial town, will show how little the personal presence of the solicitor is required.

The Court expects that all the facts necessary and proper to be stated, shall appear on the petition and accompanying schedules. These are very full and minute, are drawn up according to forms promulgated by the Court, and after verification by affidavit, are sent up to be filed. All affidavits also may be sworn before masters extraordinary in the country, by whom they are sealed up, and forwarded to the proper officer of the Court. Whatever the object of the petition, the first step after an order has been made on it, is the publication of a notice in the newspapers nearest to the property, informing all persons who may have claims on the estate of the order. Then follows the main step of all—the preparation of the abstract, and accompanying deeds and documents. Everything, of course, in a Court of Title depends on this; and further information and further evidence are often called for; but here again, the duty of a town agent is mainly to lodge what has been prepared for lodgment by a solicitor, and to obtain the rulings and directions of the Court upon the case. If a sale be required, it may take place either in town or country—at the discretion of the Court; and as to the mode, time, and place of sale, the vendors are always consulted. If a survey be required, it is of course made on the spot, and the maps are prepared at the central office of the Ordnance department; after a sale, the conveyance to a purchaser follows. The final step, where the estate is incumbered, is the preparation of the schedule of incumbrances, answering to the master's report in the foreclosure or administration suit of former times. This and the final notices to all parties interested may also be prepared at any distance, and then brought in to be settled by the officer of the court.

An important document has not been mentioned, the Rental, which contains very full particulars of all tenancies, if any, as well as the particulars and conditions of sale. This is usually prepared on the spot, after inspection of the tenants' leases; and the draft is sent up to be settled by the proper officer, before being printed. All the principal steps then being documentary and of a kind involving no question of locality, it is evident that the attendances in the offices of the Court are the principal items, requiring the intervention of an agent; and if there is a peculiarity in the "schedule of fees," it is that while the labour of preparing the various written statements and evidence required by the Court, is fairly remunerated, attendances, as such, are somewhat less liberally provided for.

From inquiries we have made of persons competent to give information on this subject, we arrive at the conclusion that, on an average, one-tenth part of the costs of proceedings are earned by the town agent, while nine-tenths may be set down as the share of the solicitor in the country, the difference in favour of the latter arising from the important items connected with the petition, abstract, and other documents required by the Court, to which reference has been made. So stands the case as between the town and country solicitors. It is right, however, to mention that the majority of the great landed proprietors confide their legal business to Dublin solicitors, so that it is unusual to find an estate of the first magnitude administered by the Court under the management of a provincial solicitor. The Court has, of course, no voice in the choice of a solicitor; but it takes care that the client shall be unfettered in his selection, and that it shall not be necessary for him to employ a solicitor in town. From what has been stated it will be obvious that the country solicitors are at no disadvantage, either as regards facilities for conducting cases, or as regards remuneration, when compared with the solicitors practising in town. Although the Court is a metropolitan one, its procedure is such as to involve none of the evils arising from centralization.

ADDRESS TO BARON GREENE.

The Incorporated Society of the attorneys and solicitors of Ireland have presented an address to Baron Greene on his retirement from the Irish Bench, which he had so long adorned. In consequence of the delicate state of the Baron's health, the address was signed in the usual manner by the president on behalf of the society, and transmitted to his lordship.

Review.

The Common Law Procedure Acts and other Statutes relating to the Practice of the Superior Courts of Common Law. With Notes. By JOHN C. F. S. DAY, Barrister-at-Law. Sweet. 1861.

The Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852, 1854, and 1860. With Notes, and the Forms and Rules, to which are prefixed, or appended, all the Acts (or portions of Acts) relating to Common Law Procedure or the Trial of Issues of Fact, in the Courts of Common Law, Chancery, or Probate, with the Rules of each Court respectively. Adapted to the use of Practitioners in all the Courts; and also to the use of Students. By W. F. FINLASON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Stevens & Sons. 1860.

A Handy Book for the Common Law Judges' Chambers. By GEO. H. PARKINSON, Chamber Clerk to the Hon. Mr. Justice Byles. Butterworths. 1861.

An important consequence of the reforms in procedure and practice introduced by the recent common law commission, and one which has not hitherto received sufficient attention, may be traced in the alteration effected in the form and character of that branch of the law, considered apart from the substantial amendments which constituted the immediate objects of those reforms. Our common law procedure was formerly an unwritten law; its sources were to be sought in the maxims of natural justice relating to procedure, and in the usage and practice of the Courts. Such a law was eminently uncertain and fluctuating, it varied from age to age and it varied in every court. It has now become characteristically a lex scripta: a written rule is to be found for the guidance of the suitor in every step in his appeal to justice. It is impossible to deny the superior advantage of this mode of treating the law of procedure. However important it may be thought to preserve the scientific connection between the commands of law and the pure sources of reason whence they emanate, the practice of the law requires some readier and more accessible guide for its ordinary and immediate necessities than the mere light of abstract principles.

The Common Law Procedure Acts have gone far towards supplying a new promulgation of the law of procedure in the form of a written law. In three successive efforts, each supplementary to the former, the Legislature has enacted a body of law on this subject which exhibits all the essential qualities of a code without its pretence. Indeed, it would not be a difficult task, by a consolidation and rearrangement of these statutes, to frame a very complete and sufficient code of procedure—one, moreover, the constituents of which have been proved by the test of experience to be adequate to the vast business conducted in our common law courts. If the next extensive alteration in the law of procedure were to take this direction, much benefit might be anticipated. At any rate, the course of our reforms in common law procedure are highly suggestive of reflections as to the true method and progress of codification in general, and as to the nature of the particular subjects to which it may rightly be applied.

This great change in the form of our law of procedure has produced a corresponding change in the mode of expounding it. The treatment of procedure as a matter of principle illustrated and explained by its manifold applications in decided cases, is now, for the most part, superseded by a plain reference to the directions of the rules and statutes. The bulky volumes of case law, compiled with so much labour and acumen by Tidd, Saunders, Lush, and Archbold, are displaced, for all ordinary practical purposes, by simple editions of the statutes. Chitty's edition of Archbold's practice, the work on procedure which is most in favour at present, and which, by the accumulated labours of successive editors, has attained a completeness that may be justly pointed to as one of the marvels of legal literature, still retains a large field of utility, and as an authority on the more minute points of procedure is indispensable; but for the commoner purpose of referring to the plain letter of the new statutes, it is certainly found very inconvenient and troublesome for use. The new enactments being scattered, section by section, throughout the work, it requires an amount of thought and care to find them, greater than the exigencies of every day practice can afford to spend. In fact, the work is too cumbersome and elaborate for the more simplified form of modern practice. In nine cases out of ten, a reference to the statute is sufficient to solve all difficulty, and the research into antecedent case law is superfluous. In order to maintain that work in the position it has hitherto held, it will be necessary to recast it thoroughly in a form more adapted to modern requirements.

In the meanwhile we can recommend to the profession Mr. Day's and Mr. Finlason's books of practice. Mr. Day's supplies the text of the statute law with just as much of case law as serves to guide its application and to explain its construction. It contains the three Common Law Procedure Acts, the Bills of Exchange Act, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act the Interpleader Acts, and other statutes of minor importance with all the rules of court relating to procedure and practice. Mr. Day is well known in Westminster Hall, as engaged in a large business of that class which ensures an intimate familiarity with practice in all its branches; and his experience and discernment have been applied with much success in annotating this edition of the statutes. He has understood how to seize the salient points for practical use, where to refrain from comment, and where to enlarge. The decisions are noted clearly, concisely, and accurately, and with an exact appreciation of their practical bearing; where occasion required they are grouped together with systematic arrangement, and throughout the work they are so presented that the practitioner may at once come at any point with facility. Practical utility, the sole object of the work, has been carefully kept in view. The two latter Common Law Procedure Acts form comparatively new ground for annotation, and on these much careful labour has been bestowed. In this part of the work, the notes on Inspection, Interrogatories, Attachment of Debts, Equitable Defences, Interpleader, and Equitable Relief against Forfeiture, will be found to contain much new and valuable matter. Among the recent points of interest which have turned up on the new Acts, and which may be found referred to in this volume, the following seem worthy of notice. From the case of The Penarth Harbour Company v. Cardiff Waterworks Company (29 L. J., C. P., 230), it appears that the summary abolition of the old ceremony of proferet and oyer, inadvertently carried away with it the only mode by which one party obtained inspection of the documents relied on in the pleadings of his opponent. The judges, however, deciding that it was not the intention of the Act to abolish this right of inspection, granted an equivalent inspection upon summons, under their summary jurisdiction. This case appears to have been too recent for Mr. Day to insert under its proper section; but we find it duly noted up under the subsequent Act in treating of inspection. The case of Bates v. Bates (9 W. R. 255, noted in the addenda to Mr. Day's work), illustrates the extensive effect of the 18th section of the first Act. The plaintiff, having served the defendant with a writ in California, was allowed to proceed by filing a declaration, and sticking up a notice in the Master's office, requiring the defendant to plead in eight days. Willes, J., who had been one of the commissioners, however, said that he was quite sure that the intention of the framers of that section was, that there should be notice of the declaration, and an opportunity to plead. The case of Ex parte Turner (36 L. J. c. 93, noted in the addenda), is also important. It shows that funds in the hands of the official manager of a company may be attached by a creditor of the company under the garnishee clauses.

The Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, has extended interpleader proceedings to cases where "the titles of the claimants have not a common origin, but are adverse to, and independent of, one another." What cases fall within this extension, Mr. Day confesses his inability to explain. We feel obliged to confess a similar inability, and having sought in other quarters in vain for an explanation, cannot fairly impute it to him as a defect, especially as he has taken the occasion of this section to explain the difficult practice of interpleader in a very full note. On the whole, we have found his work very trustworthy and sufficient on the points to which we have referred for the purpose of testing it; and, in our opinion, it seems calculated to be highly useful to practitioners as a book of common law practice. A more than usually careful and copious index, by Mr. O. B. C. Harrison, renders the otherwise disconnected contents readily available, and shows that no pains have been spared in making the work complete.

The plan of Mr. Finlason's book is not quite so ambitious as that of Mr. Day. Mr. Finlason, in addition to the Common Law Procedure Acts, gives also the text of the Bills of Exchange Act; the Bills of Sale Act; the Mercantile Law Amendment Act; the County Courts Act, (so far as relates to procedure in the superior courts); the Chancery Amendment Act as to trials of issues of fact; the Court of Probate Act, and the Divorce Court Act; and upon all these there are judicious and practical notes, although there is of course nothing like an attempt at a complete or exhaustive treatment of the numerous subjects touched upon. Mr. Finlason's book embraces a wider field than is occupied by Mr. Day, is printed upon much better paper, and is altogether much more convenient for use in court, or the judges' chambers. There is one drawback to it, however,—it has no list of cases, and its index is certainly too meagre. The notes would also have been more useful if Mr. Finlason had made greater reference to the practice cases to be found in the pages of the Weekly Reporter.

We have hardly left ourselves room to say any more of Mr. Parkinson's Handy Book, than that it is extremely well calculated for the purpose for which it is intended. So much work is now done in common law chambers by junior clerks, that such a little treatise is much wanted. Mr. Parkinson has performed his task skilfully, and with care.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

At a meeting of this Society held on the 14th of January last, Mr. Serjeant WOOLRYCH read the following paper on "The Expediency of abolishing the practice of Opening Biddings in the Court of Chancery:"—

From very early times, certainly for more than a century, it has been the practice of the Court of Chancery to direct the re-sale of an estate, although an actual purchaser may be in existence. The estate having been sold under the order of the Court, this practice is denominated, "opening the biddings." There are undoubtedly instances where a purchase effected through fraud or collusion has been set aside by a court of equity, but it is peculiar to that court to set aside a bond fide purchase upon an advance of price (which is the staple of the new bidding), to open the sale after the purchase has been confirmed by the master, or, as at present, after eight days succeeding the judge's certificate. The latitude allowed is considerable, and the discretion absolute. It is immaterial, with regard to the principle, whether the disappointed claimant were present or not at the sale, nor is any advanced sum in particular, as £10, to be considered as conferring any certain right to the privilege; nor even after the eight days, can a purchaser be entirely sure whether some sinister suggestion may not, at least, embarrass him with an uncertain litigation, the Court having, on the one hand, the unction of keeping faith with purchasers, and on the other, an anxiety to help suitors by shielding them from the remotest chance of collusion. It may be said that these difficulties, which occasionally beset the purchaser in Chancery, may have operated to throw a shade over the value of the property offered. By analogy to the case of copyholds, the price of which is calculated with reference to the expected fines and other burthens, it might be supposed that the buyer of a chancery estate would likewise make his tender in conformity with the prospects he might entertain of future disappointment or litigation. Hence, on the other hand, the Court might have interposed its anomalous jurisdiction in order to protect property from undue depreciation. It must, however, be remembered, if any weight be assigned to this argument, that there is always a paper containing a reserved bidding, which remains in the hands of the auctioneer, until the close of the sale of each lot; so that it would seem to be a sufficient protection to produce this reserve without calling in aid the additional power which the courts have so long assumed. The question is, whether there are any claims on behalf of an intending purchaser in the Court of Chancery of a superior character to those of a person who has been disappointed of his wishes at an ordinary auction. There have been three elements in the consideration of this matter—the state of things before the confirmation of the report by the master; the position of vendor and purchaser after that approval; and the condition of the same parties under the modern usage of allowing biddings to be opened within eight days next after the signature of the judge's certificate of sale.

The first point has been productive of many discussions, the second and third must be viewed within a much narrower circle. Under the first head, a reasonable proposal of augmentation was generally deemed sufficient to warrant the suggestion of the application for a new sale, as in the case of a price wholly inadequate to the value of the estate. (By Lord Langdale, 17 L. J. Ch. 486, in Manvers v. Furze.) There is no rule as to 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. The discretion of the judge under each peculiar concern is employed. Where a sum of £350 was offered as an addition to £5,300, it was not accepted, being too small, and the judge took occasion to observe that the Court does not confine itself to a particular rate per cent., although 10 per cent. is a sort of general rule. (1 Sim. & Stu., 20, Garstone v. Edwards; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr., 856, Bridges v. Phillips, M.S.) But £500 added to £12,010 were permitted. (2 Russ. 606, Lefroy v. Lefroy.) So £500 on £8,950. (1 M'C. 82, Pearson v. Collett.) Under any circumstances, an advance of less than £40 will not be received. (4 Madd. 460, Farlow v. Weildon and Gilbert v. Wethered was cited, 8. P. Ibid; See some Irish cases; £40 at the least, £10 per cent. in advance; Rule refused, cor. Hart v. C., 2 Moll. 510, Leland v. Griffith; See Ibid. 508, Aubrey v. Denny; £10 per cent. required upon a larger sum, Ibid. 508, Chester v. Gorges; Costs of former purchaser to be paid; See several other cases, Dart's Vend. & Purch., 3rd. ed. 755.)

A larger sum seems to have been expected from a person present at the sale than from a stranger; (Jac. Rep. 526, Tyndall v. Warre.) indeed a struggle was made to hinder a person present at the sale from any interference, as to future views upon the estate. The principle enunciated by Sir John Leach was, that the sales by the court would not in that case have the full benefit of the spirit of competition, and the cases were Somner v. Charlton (5 Ves. 655.) and M. Culloch v. Colbatch, (3 Madd. 314, Ibid.) and another case, as it seems, before Lord Kenyon. (16 Ves. 140, by Benyon, amicus curie, Lord Eldon apparently acc. in Preston v. Barker.) But these authorities have not survived in that character, although Lord Eldon was much disposed, using his own words, "To discourage a person present at the sale, and lying by, speculating upon the event, and afterwards coming forward with an advance." (6 Ves. 117, Rigby v. Macnamara.) Yet he gave way, upon being informed that in the only case to the contrary the person seeking to open the biddings was a party to the cause. (2 Jac. & W. 347, Thornhill v. Thornhill, 1 Ch. P. Coop. 380, Shallcross v. Hibberson.) Lord Loughborough had previously sanctioned such an opening, although it was said that the estates had been sold above the value. (5 Ves. 655, Tait v. Ld. Northwick.) It does not follow, nevertheless, that a chancellor considers himself bound by the decision of another chancellor. And the second bidding was allowed, at the instance of a person who had attended the former sale by an agent. (5 Ves. 655, Tait v. Ld. Northwick.) So again, the only doubt was as to the amount of the advance in such a case; and that amount having been increased, the order was made. (5 McClelland 82, Pearson v. Collett.) It is no objection that a party interested as a residuary legatee, seeks to have a second sale; (G. Coop. 95, Hooper v. Goodwin.) still, the right rule is, that the opening of biddings is not so much intended for the purchaser or persons desirous of a fresh sale, as for the owners of the estate, especially creditors, infants, and persons who are not acquainted with the value of the property. (2 Russ. 606, Lefroy v. Lefroy.)

After the confirmation of the report of the sale by the master, it was certainly most unusual to interfere. (3 Bro. C.C. 475, Scott v. Nesbit; 1 Ves., jun. 287, Prideaux v. Prideaux; 11 Ves. 57, Morice v. Bishop of Durham; 14 Ves. 151, White v. Wilson; 1 Kay & J. 28.) Mere overbidding was not deemed sufficient. (3 Anstr. 656, Boyer v. Blackwell.) There was some collusion in Gower's case; (2 Eden. 348.) and, on that ground, the biddings were re-opened, but after the second sale, an advance of £2,000 in order to a third sale was rejected, for this was overbidding alone. This denial, however, as to overbidding must not be confounded with overbidding alone before the confirmation of the report or the certificate. The principle is quite different.

A fault on the part of the purchaser will produce this alteration, as fraud. So fraudulent negligence in another person, an agent, for example, would have the same effect, for it is against conscience that the purchaser should take advantage of such misbehaviour. Yet so precarious were the proceedings of courts of equity, that in cases where Lord Eldon would decline to interfere, Lord Loughborough, even after the confirmation of the report, hesitated simply upon the amount of advance. "They must bid more," said the chancellor. They bade more, and the offer was accepted. (5 Ves. 86, Chetham v. Grurgeon.)

Upon one occasion the vendor was in prison, and before the confirmation of the report, he had a promise from two persons that they would instruct their agents to open the biddings, but they failed in their engagement. There was an overbidding of £4,000, the largest sum ever known in that character. Nevertheless, the lords commissioners would not have accepted that sum as an overbidding without more, but they yielded to the circumstance of duress, requiring from him, the vendor, a deposit of the full sum of £4,000. (2 Ves., jun., 51, Watson v. Birch.) Yet, strong as this case appears, Lord Eldon said he never would have made these orders. He disapproved strongly of Watson v. Birch. There was neither fraudulent conduct in the purchaser, nor fraudulent negligence in any other person. (In Morice v. the Bishop of Durham, 11 Ves. 57.)

Fraud, therefore, is decisive upon the point. A survey was made of an estate, and by collusion with the tenants (who would pay so much less rent), the value and quality of the estate were underrated. It was then sold for the benefit of creditors, and fetched £27,500. £800 were then offered in advance, the report not having as yet been confirmed, and a second sale took place. The sum of £28,500 was then offered, and the master reported in favour of the bidder. The report was then confirmed, upon which all these facts of collusion and depreciation were revealed, and £2,000 more being tendered, the sale was again opened, it being positively affirmed by the chancellor (Lord Northington) that the overbidding alone would not have sufficed. The estate brought £38,000, and £2,000 still in increase being pressed forward, the court declined to interpose after the confirmation of a fresh report. (2 Eden. 348, Gower v. Gower.) Thus the principles of overbidding and fraud were clearly distinguished.

Surprise was scarcely held to be an ingredient upon the discussion of the master's report, nor is it now under the certificate. At all events, where the applicant was present at a sale, and was informed, in common with the rest of the company, by the auctioneer, that any one might come within eight days after the report, but failed to appear, no allegation of surprise was allowed to be entertained, (2 Jac. & Walk. 347, Thornhill v. Thornhill.) and a mistake as to the day of sale will require a strong advance. (1 Ves., jun. 453, Anon.)

We have said that the certificate of eight days is equivalent to the old confirmation of the report by the master, therefore, within that time the biddings will be opened, (1 Kay & J., 28, Bridger v. Pinfold.) and it is worthy of remark that the modern judges of the Court of Chancery are quite prepared to support the practice which is now under discussion, notwithstanding the force of prior decisions. Very special circumstances might even induce them to yield to an application made at the end of eight days from the certificate of sale. There appears to be some colour for this in a case where the purchaser bought a lot for £2,770, and signed the contract. It was on the 2nd of August. On the 4th the certificate was settled, and was approved on the 9th by the judge. Eight days clear were then allowable for any one to apply for an order to open the biddings. That period having expired during the long vacation, the purchaser required the abstracts of title, and these he got, together with the valuation of the timber on the estate on the 21st of August. The business then proceeded; but on the 29th a summons was served upon the purchaser, to the effect that if all his costs should be paid, another person having offered, an advanced bidding should be substituted in his room. The Vice-Chancellor stating that the increase of price amounted to £300, granted the prayer, and made the order; whereupon the purchaser appealed. Now, there were some singular facts in this case. The agent for the person who had been so far successful in opening the biddings, had actually declared that he would bid no longer, since the biddings had gone far beyond the value of the property. The land, as valued, was worth £1,400, whereas, £2,770 were offered for it at the sale. Of course, according to the most ordinary rules of common sense, the appeal succeeded; but the L. J. Knight Bruce used these equivocal expressions—"Glad as he would have been to give the applicant relief on a substantial advance of price, he thought it would be dangerous to the general practice of the court to grant the application. The case, however, was not one for costs." (25 L. J. Ch. 201.) If I read this decision rightly, it holds that an individual who has offered £1,800 more than the value of an estate, and who has, to all intents, been declared the purchaser, and who has duly awaited the time proscribed by law for the ratification of his purchase, may be suddenly invaded by a new claimant, narrowly avoid the consequences of the claim, and be saddled with his own costs of a most righteous appeal. So closely pressed were the counsel against the purchaser, that they first objected to the counting of any part of the vacation in the eight days; and, secondly, they called this a case of great hardship, because the interests of infants were concerned.

«This event occurred in 1856. Some months afterwards another case arose of equal hardship, if we regard the principle of the subject now under consideration. (Osborn v. Foreman, 25 L. J. Ch. 340.) A property had been put up for sale, but the reserved bidding was not reached. Upon this, it was settled that a sale with sealed tenders should be attempted. There were two candidates; one offered £36,500, the other £34,000. On the 8th of February, the chief clerk found in favour of the higher sum. On the 12th, the certificate was signed and approved by the Vice-Chancellor; but on the 11th, the day previous, a summons had been taken out by the person who tendered the lowest sum, i.e., £34,000, and upon the hearing, he having then proposed to give £38,000, was declared the purchaser. It must be understood that he undertook to replace the stock which had been sold out for the purpose of fulfilling the contract for £36,500. From this decision, the original purchaser appealed. He did not dispute the power of the court to open the biddings, had the sale been carried on by auction, but he said that this was a sale by private contract. In fact, an opportunity was afforded for the court to escape from the principle of destroying the good faith of an accomplished contract, by likening it, as it really was, to the matter of a private transaction. Not so was the opinion of the court. They did not even hear the counsel for the new claimant. They dwelt upon the condition of sale, that it was to take place with the sanction of the Vice-Chancellor, and they held that all the incidents of days must apply as in the case of an auction. Of course, there being one day short, there was, in their view, time to disturb the certificate. But Lord J. Knight Bruce, who had on the former occasion declined to give costs, here said, "I concur with regret. Mr. Barlow's costs of the appeal ought to be provided for;" and they were immediately promised under an arrangement. (This case was confirmed by the House of Lords.) Now it seems rather strange that the Lord Justice, who had previously withheld costs from a party who was truly and justly successful, should here have recommended the payment of them to one who was unsuccessful. The judge must have thought it inequitable that a purchaser who by what was in reality a private contract, had offered more than £30,000 for an estate, should have been suddenly supplanted by a buyer who had deliberately sent, in writing, to the proper authority, the amount which he was prepared to give. It is presumed that the successful appellee in this case might, in his turn, have been deprived of his bargain by the tempting tender of £40,000 by another aspirant. Particular reference was made in Osborne v. Foreman to a decision of the Vice-Chancellor Wood, then recently delivered by that judge. Lord Justice Turner seemed anxious to avoid a collision between the authorities, or to establish a diversity of opinion between himself and the very eminent person just mentioned. "But," said the Lord Justice, "this case, in the opinion of their lordships, turned on different grounds from those in that case." (25 L. J., 341.)

Now that case was Millican v. Vanderplank (11 Hare, 136); that was also a case of private contract, but there were no sealed tenders, and the ground upon which it was sought to be distinguished was, no doubt, because the purchaser had entered upon the property and expended money upon it, and had incurred liabilities in respect of it, not merely at his own instance, but with the approval and acquiescence of all the parties interested. Both vendor and purchaser had so agreed as to prevent their being again placed respectively in their original positions. So far there seems to be a fair distinction. But the Vice-Chancellor laid down the principle rather more broadly. For he said that, "When the master has approved of a sale by contract in the presence of the parties, no stranger can intervene to prevent the confirmation of the report; nor will the sale be disturbed by the court on the mere ground that a larger price has been offered subsequently, and before such confirmation, unless there be some error or miscarriage in the proceedings, or the contract price be grossly inadequate." These remarks are of a very strong character. They point at a clear distinction between the sale by auction and by private contract, and can hardly be reconciled with the opinions expressed in Osborne v. Foreman, however ingeniously it was endeavoured upon that occasion to preserve the alliance. The only argument which has been advanced assumes a distinction between a sale with sealed tenders and one by private contract. It is not necessary to discuss the point here, because we pretend to higher ground, the absolute extinction of this equity custom.

Notwithstanding all these cases, you are not to suppose that the tide of judicial opinion has been uniform in favour of the custom. Lord Thurlow declared that he would not open at all after confirmation of the report. (3 Bro. C. C. 475. Scott v. Nesbit.) Mr. Maddock in his chancery practice, asserts on the authority of an anonymous MS., that "By some judges it has been thought that the permission to open biddings does more harm than good." (Vol. 2, p. 655.) Still it is but fair to say that he adds; "by others, that the right to open biddings should not be so much restrained as it is" (ibid.), and he cites Vice-Chancellor Leach as his authority, from an MS. (Vol. 2, p. 655.) But Lord Eldon, whatever his doubts, which have descended to posterity, may have been, was strong upon this point.

In 1809, his lordship remarked upon the bad effect of opening biddings in general, from the uncertainty attending purchasers in this court. (In Preston v. Barker, 16 Ves. 160.) Again, in 1820, he said, "I believe that the rule of opening the biddings, which was intended to protect, has frequently been very pernicious to the interests of the suitors in this court, and

"For many years," he said again in 1822, "that I have been here, I have heard the practice of opening biddings lamented, and I cannot therefore account for it having continued a rule of the court, except upon a notion which I believe to be well founded, that there is in general more real wisdom in adhering to the old practice than in adopting new rules." (In Tyndale v. Warre, Jac. 326) Here the groundless apprehension of change was exhibited in high relief by the great lawyer. It was in a case indeed, where the appellant was present at the sale, but the observations were general. If it were necessary to make a change he would consult the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellor. Again, in 1823, Lord Eldon said, "During a period of nearly half a century which I have passed in this court, and in which Lord Apsley, Lord Thurlow, the Lords Commissioners, with Lord Loughborough at their head, have presided here, I have heard one and all of them lament that the practice of opening biddings was ever introduced. I confess that I have great doubts myself upon the subject; but after a practice so long established, it is not for me to disturb it." (In Williams v. Attenborough, Turn. & Russ. 75.) Lord Redesdale likewise observed in his court, "It is a general complaint that estates sold under decrees of the court go at considerable under-value; the cause of this is the trouble purchasers are put to, in completing their purchases. If greater strictness were preserved in opening the biddings, it would have the effect of producing better sales." (1 Sch. & L. 350.)

Lord Cranworth also made an ominous remark in Barlow v. Osborne, (4 Jur. 367.) which, had he been quite content with the existing practice, he might have foreborne. "These are all discussions which are proper to be addressed to the Legislature which has the power of altering the law;" (Id. 358) and again, "it does seem to me most unreasonable that a vendor should, in cases of this kind, when his property is sold under a decree of the court, be protected at both ends, as it were, both before and after the purchase is made. It seems to me to furnish the strongest grounds for thinking that a general order should be issued by the Court of Chancery for the purpose of altering the present practice, (Id. 369.) And in 1817, Macdonald, C. B., thus expressed himself: "If one who has given a fair price and is confirmed purchaser before the master, is liable at the distance of several months, and after he has arranged his affairs upon the faith of the purchase, to have it set aside, upon the mere circumstance of another person offering a larger price, it must necessarily affect all sales under the authority of the court, by deterring purchasers from bidding. It is, thereupon, the general interest of the suitors to discourage the opening of biddings, unless upon peculiar circumstances in the first sale. As no such circumstances appear in this case, the order cannot be granted." (In Boyer v. Blackwell, 3 Anstr. 657)

There is another principle not a little important, when we come to investigate the subject. The court will suffer a third sale, if there be found a candidate equal to the mark, (Bro. Ch. Ca. 475. Scott v. Nesbit), and upon an application by the same person. (8 Beav. 352. Walrond v. Walrond, see the cases of Colliery Shares, 8 Ves. 502. Wren v. Kirton.) However, in ordinary cases, the sale will be revived. £1,050 were bid, and there was an order to open the biddings upon a deposit of £300. The second sale took place, and £1,338 were bid; but another offer of £160 was made by the same person who had opened the biddings. The Lord Chancellor said he remembered no such application, but as the purchaser did not appear to object he made the order. (16 Ves. 140; Preston v. Barker.)

I may just mention as matter of legal history, that when a buyer has taken several lots, and as to one of these, the biddings are opened, it is the rule to give him the option of retiring from the remainder. Macdonald, C.B., thought this a reasonable request; (3 Anstr., 656. Boyer v. Blackwell) but the Vice-Chancellor (Leach) upon a subsequent occasion made a distinction between lots purchased before the lots which are the subject of the application and those after. He said, "Where a person became the purchaser of a subsequent lot, in consequence of his being declared the best bidder of a prior lot it was reasonable that he should have the option of retaining or retiring from the subsequent lot. (1 Sim. & Stu., 386. Price v. Price.) In another case, the same Vice-Chancellor required an affidavit from the purchaser "that he had bid for the lot in consequence of having been declared the best bidder for the prior lot." (Ibid. Fielder v. Fielder. See 4 Madd. 227. Roffey v. Shallcross, and note (C.) there. As to timber, see 6 Sim. 380. Bates v. Bonner, 10 per cent. advance; and for other cases, Dart on Vendors, p. 756.)

It is obvious that, from the details and observations which have been submitted to the society, the object intended in these papers is to prepare the way for an Act of Parliament, or it may be a rule of the courts to assimilate the sales directed by the Court of Chancery with other contracts between buyer and seller. It seems better to return to that ordinary commercial dealing which has so long established good faith and right assurance between man and man. Undoubtedly, the equity judges have endeavoured to preserve, as far as possible, the fair balance between buyers and sellers; but of a practice what can be said commendatory, when the great oracles which have the administration of it are by no means agreed as to the propriety of its continuance? No sooner will the Court of Chancery forbear or be restrained from this method of conducting sales, than the same confidence will arise in the market of that court which obtains in the great market of the world.

STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

A Bill with this title is quietly making its way through the House of Commons in the guise of a "private Bill." But the measure is one of such great and general importance as to make it only fair and proper that it should be brought before Parliament in its true character of a "public Bill."

It proposes to authorise the company to lay down rails along the surface of such of the streets of the metropolis, or of any other towns in the United Kingdom, as shall be selected with the consent of the parties having the control or the duty of directing the repair of such streets, and to give to the company the exclusive right of using carriages with flange wheels on such rails, reserving to the public the right of using the rails and plates with carriages having common road wheels.

The general character of the measure, affecting as it does the streets of the whole kingdom, seems imperatively to demand that it should be treated as a public Bill, especially as this general nature of the Bill prevents the standing orders, which require notice to parties affected and provide other securities, being applicable to it.

The Bill stands for the second reading on Monday next.

REPORTS AND MEETINGS.

BRISTOL AND EXETER RAILWAY.

The directors, by their report, recommend a dividend at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum for the last half-year, carrying a balance of £2,991 to the next account.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.

The directors of this company have declared a dividend of £1 3s. 9d. per cent. for the half-year, being at the rate of £2 7s. 6d. per annum on the ordinary share capital of the company, leaving £5,620 to be carried to the next account.

EQUITY AND LAW LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

This society held its sixteenth annual general meeting yesterday. During the past year 169 policies of assurance have been effected, producing in new premiums £7,407. The income of the society now amounts to about £60,000, and the funds to £274,489 11s. 2d. The number of policies in force on the 31st December last was 1,425, amounting, exclusive of bonuses and additions, to £1,533,707. The report was unanimously adopted.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.

The directors of this company will recommend at the ensuing meeting that the following dividends be declared, viz.:—At the rate of £6 7s. 6d. per cent. per annum on the original stock, £3 per cent. on the B stock, and £3 7s. 6d. per cent. on the A stock, leaving £965 to be carried forward.

GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held in Dublin on the 16th instant, a dividend at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum was declared.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 15th instant, the Earl of Shelburne in the chair, a dividend of 3½ per cent. per annum on the Consolidated Stock of the company was declared, and the retiring directors were unanimously re-elected.

GREAT WESTERN AND BRENTFORD RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held on the 20th inst. a dividend of 5 per cent. per annum on the preference shares, and of two per cent. per annum on the ordinary shares was declared, leaving a balance of £567 to be carried forward to the next account.

HULL AND HOLDERNESS RAILWAY.

The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on the 7th inst., and a dividend of 3½ per cent. was declared. The chairman stated that there would be only two more dividends at that rate. All subsequent dividends would be at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY.

The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on the 19th inst. The report of the directors recommending a dividend at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum for the last half year on the consolidated stock was adopted. The dividend became payable on the 20th inst.

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held yesterday, a dividend of 5½ per cent. was declared.

MARYPORT AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held on the 20th inst. a dividend of 3s. on original £50 shares, and on other shares in proportion, was declared; being at the rate of £7 per cent. per annum.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 15th inst., a dividend of 7 per cent. was declared on the old stock; the dividend in the usual proportion on the Birmingham and Derby stock, and on the other preferential and consolidated stocks of the company.

Resolutions were also passed for the consolidation of some of the smaller stocks, and a vote of £22,000 was taken for works.

NORFOLK RAILWAY.

At the meeting to be held on the 26th inst. the directors will recommend a dividend at the rate of £1 17s. 6d. per cent. for the last half-year, being at the rate of £3 15s. per cent. per annum.

NOTTINGHAM AND GRANTHAM RAILWAY.

The report of the directors states that the remainder of the share capital had been called up, and the mortgage debt reduced to £52,915, and before the next meeting would be discharged. The directors propose a dividend of 3s. 6d. per share payable on the 7th of March, making 7s. for the year as against 6s. 6d. for the year 1859.

SALISBURY AND YEovil RAILWAY.

The directors' report states that the balance available for dividend was £6,646, out of which they recommend a dividend at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum, should be declared. This will leave a balance of £246, which, with the balance in hand on 1st July last, makes a total of £3,560 to be carried forward to the next half-year.

SOUTHAMPTON DOCKS COMPANY.

The directors recommend a dividend of £1 10s. per cent. for the last half year. This, with the dividend paid for the previous half year, will make £3 10s. per cent. for the year 1860.

SOUTH EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

At the ensuing half-yearly meeting on the 28th inst., the directors will recommend a dividend of 18s. on each £30 stock, being at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

SOUTH WALES RAILWAY.

The directors, by their report, recommend that a dividend be declared for the last half year at the rate of £3 per cent. per annum, leaving a balance of £2,310 to be carried forward.

SOUTH WESTERN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 14th inst., a dividend was declared at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum.

A resolution to convert the capital of the company into 4½ per cent. preferential stock of the London and South Western Railway Company was carried unanimously.

SOUTH YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.

After deducting the interest on preference shares the directors recommended a dividend at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum on ordinary capital.

STOCKPORT AND DISLEY RAILWAY.

The report of the directors states that the traffic receipts show an increase of 15 per cent. over those of 1859, and recommends a dividend of 2½ per cent. per annum.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

A dividend at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum was declared at the recent half-yearly meeting, and resolutions were passed authorizing the conversion of capital fully paid up into stock.

TAFF VALE RAILWAY.

The report of the directors states that the traffic receipts for the last half year are very satisfactory, and recommends a dividend at the rate of £9 per cent. per annum to be declared.

ULVERSTONE AND LANCASTER RAILWAY.

The directors recommend a dividend at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum for the last half-year, leaving a balance of £3,000.

VALE OF NEATH RAILWAY.

The report of the directors recommends a dividend at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum for the last half-year. This will leave a balance of £1,180 to be carried forward to the next half-year.

VICTORIA STATION AND PIMLICO RAILWAY.

The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on the 20th inst. In moving the adoption of the directors' report, the chairman stated that it was probable a small dividend would be declared at the next half-yearly meeting. He estimated that the dividend would average up to 1867 about 6 per cent. on the ordinary shares, and that after that year it would be larger.

WEST MIDLAND RAILWAY.

The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on the 14th inst.

The chairman stated there were thirty Bills before Parliament in which the company were more or less interested. A line called the Coast of Wales Railway had been projected and the directors had arranged, subject to the sanction of the proprietors, to work it at 52½ per cent. on the traffic.

The report of the directors was confirmed, and dividends declared.

WHITEHAVEN JUNCTION RAILWAY.

The directors recommend a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent. for the half-year ending 31st Dec. last.

WHITEHAVEN AND FURNESS RAILWAY.

The directors propose that a dividend for the half year ending 31st Dec. last, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum shall be declared. This is an excess of 1½ per cent. over that declared for the corresponding period of the previous year.

CURRENT TOPICS.

In addition to the Bankruptcy Bill and Criminal Law Consolidation Bills, of which people are pretty well tired by this time, there are now before Parliament a few less pretentious measures affecting the law. One is a Bill of Lord St. Leonards', to abolish the doctrine of implied or constructive notice. The Law of Property Bill, 1859, originally contained a clause to which the present Bill bears a strong resemblance, if, indeed, it was not intended to make them substantially identical. In the former Bill a purchaser or mortgagee was not to be bound by any other than actual notice of a charge. While that Bill was before Parliament we discussed this clause at considerable length,* with the view of showing the insurmountable difficulties which would attend any such enactment, especially having regard to the confusion and obscurity introduced into the authorities by the uncertain term "actual notice," and to the doctrines of courts of equity in respect of fraud. Lord St. Leonards now proposes, in place of enacting that a purchaser or mortgagee should not be bound by any other than actual notice, to enact that no purchaser or mortgagee shall be bound by any implied or constructive notice, unless the Court shall be of opinion that his conduct amounts to fraud. We shall take an early opportunity of offering some observations on this Bill, which, to our minds, so far from being free from the objections urged by us two years ago, is exposed to them even more than its forerunner.

Mr. Hodgkinson's Fictitious Defences Bill seems also to be very much open to exception. It proposes that in every action where a plaintiff makes an affidavit that the defendant is indebted to him in the sum mentioned in the writ, no defendant shall be at liberty to enter an appearance, unless he in reply makes an affidavit that he has "a good defence," or obtains leave from a judge, upon terms. Neither plaintiffs nor defendants, where they are unscrupulous persons, would have much difficulty in making such an affidavit, especially when it came to be regarded—as it would very soon—as little more than a formality; while the cases provided for by the Bill—where a judge would have to decide whether the defendant had really a legal or equitable defence—would, in fact, involve a preliminary hearing, and thus greatly increase expense, instead of diminishing it.

The Bill to afford facilities for the better ascertainment of the law of foreign countries when pleaded in our courts, is calculated to be very useful, and seems to have been carefully considered.

The Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association has had under its consideration the changes in the new Bankruptcy Bill relating to the taxation of costs in the provinces. Taxation by the country registrars, according to the present system, has been found to work most unsatisfactorily. Some of the registrars know very little about their work, and there is nothing like uniformity in their treatment of bills of costs. It has been proposed that, in order to secure one uniform method and scale, all bills of costs in bankruptcy should be taxed in London.

This remedy, however, would be unquestionably worse than the disease. Taxation in London would involve either the presence here for that purpose of the country solicitor, or the attendance of an agent, who could not know much about the business done, and, therefore, could not give the taxing master the necessary information upon the items of the bill. We believe, that the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association have proposed that two of the taxing masters to the court should periodically make a circuit, for the purpose of taxing bills. This appears to us to be the best plan yet suggested. What do our provincial readers think of it?

When Lord St. Leonards' Law of Property Act, 1860, was passed, a very important defect in it was pointed out in these columns. Our readers are aware that the statute does not do away with the necessity of registering judgments; while in order to give effect to them as against purchasers or mortgagees, it obliges the registration of writs of execution, which are enforceable only within three months after such registration. We desire now not to repeat the observations which we have already more than once made upon the general impolicy of this provision; but merely to call attention to the practical inconvenience of the mode prescribed for the registration of writs of execution. Judgments are registered in the names of defendants; but by Lord St. Leonards' Act of last session, it is enacted that executions are to be registered in the names of plaintiffs. Not only does a double search thus become necessary, but a double search of the widest range and most inconvenient character. A purchaser or mortgagee who desires to know whether an estate is affected under the provisions of the Act, by a judgment against John Styles, must first search the register of judgments against his name, and having thus obtained the names of all the plaintiffs who have registered judgments against him, is then compelled to search the register of executions not against the name of John Styles, but against the names of all the plaintiffs disclosed by the register of judgments. We are unable to suggest any reason for this cumbrous plan. The reasonable and obvious mode of registering executions would appear to be in the name of those parties only against whom the writs are issued. At all events, although this would not preclude the necessity of a double search for judgments and executions, it would at all events very much restrict the range of search, and make it much less expensive and bewildering than at present.

Two very important cases have been before the House of Lords, one of which has been partly heard, and the other of which has been decided, during the present week. In Brook v. Brook the appellants' counsel have not yet completed their somewhat hopeless attempt to upset the decision of Vice-Chancellor Stuart, assisted by Sir C. Cresswell, which was to the effect that a marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister—both being English subjects and domiciled in England—although celebrated in a foreign country where the marriage was legal, is not valid in this country.

In the Berkeley peerage case, which has been before the House of Lords for two years past, their lordships delivered the judgment of the House on Wednesday last. It has been decided that the claimant, Sir M. F. F. Berkeley, is not entitled to the dignity of baron. The effect of the decision is, that according to the law of England there is no barony by tenure; or, in other words, no person can claim to be a peer of Parliament, and therefore to have, as of right, a writ of summons, as the tenant of any manor or hereditaments.

NISI PRIUS GLEANINGS.

If any one doubts the value of trial by jury, let him ask himself, what other tribunal could fix the compensation due for wounded feelings and disappointed hopes with the same promptitude and confidence. We suspect that the contrivance of adding together the figures named by the individual jurymen and dividing the whole by twelve must be frequently adopted; and we own that in many cases we should be at a loss to improve upon this simple method. We feel the utility of an institution which disposes without thought of difficulties, which, upon deliberation, would begin to appear insuperable. Suppose, for example, that we allowed ourselves to ask upon what principle we would proceed to assess damages for a breach of promise to marry, we should find ourselves launched on a boundless ocean without chart or compass. There have been lately five reported cases of this kind in which verdicts have been given for £25, £40, £50, £75, and £100. In four out of these five cases we can, indeed, discern the glimmering of a principle—not, however, legal, or moral, or economical, but arithmetical. The round sum of £100, or the half, quarter, or three-fourths of it, are figures with which the mind of an ordinary jurymen would be familiar. Even the abnormal £40 may be brought within the same category by the plausible conjecture that a strong party in the jury proposed £50, and an obstinate minority compelled a reduction of £10.

A foreigner visiting our courts would be equally astonished at the engagements of which he might hear the history, and at the issue of them. A courtship of five years, between Mr. Isaacs and Miss Myers, was terminated by the marriage of the former with Miss Moses. Miss Myers thereupon brought an action, and got £100 damages. At the time of the trial the plaintiff and defendant had reached the ages of 46 and 50 years. Those who cannot afford to marry not unfrequently engage themselves and wait several years until they can. This custom may be made intelligible to a foreigner, although the fullest explanation will leave him still contemplating it with surprise. But what foreigner, or, indeed, what Englishman, can understand the motive of the procrastination of a marriage seriously intended between parties of mature age, and to which circumstances offered no impediment? Mr. Isaacs possessed some property, and was in good business as a buyer of stores, and he had several children by a former wife. One would think that if there had been a serious purpose, it would have been accomplished long ago; and if there were not, the plaintiff could have no claim for damages. It was stated at the trial that the nation to which these litigants belonged do not often allow themselves to appear in such a ridiculous position. Indeed, although the case was sufficiently absurd, it wanted that usual source of laughter—the correspondence between the lovers. Perhaps Mr. Isaacs had been a dealer in stores too long to care about waste paper even in the form of love letters.

A hasty observer might conclude that the defendants in these actions must be men of irregular impulses and wayward character, whose habits of thought and action were as far as possible removed from those of sober, wary, money-getting citizens. Yet we have just parted from a Jew, who had reached middle life in an employment well adapted to sober the imagination and to fix the mind on the vanity of earthly things—that of a dealer in second-hand and worn-out articles of many kinds. The next defendant who presents himself is by nation a Scot and by trade a bagman—conditions equally unfavourable to the predominance of caprice or levity. It is, however, to be observed in both these cases, that the defendants may have acted as they did on the calculation that female society would, for the time, be pleasant, although marriage as the sequel of it might be either inconvenient or impossible. It appeared that the Scotchman had a wife and three children living in his native country. Being an exile in the extreme West of England, and using the Temperance Hotel at Falmouth as the centre around which he circled with his pack of draperies, he might have thought that his laborious and lonely life would be brightened by the kind looks and tender cares of the landlady of the aforesaid hotel. His habit was to stay at the house once a fortnight. It does not appear whether he paid his score; but it is certain that he took walks with the landlady, and went to chapel with her, and talked of what he should do as master of the house; and when he was on his rounds he wrote to her a great number of letters, from which it may be supposed he derived a pleasure second only to that of sitting with her in the bar—if there be a bar—of the temperance hotel or in the pew at chapel. He enjoyed all these conveniences and mitigations of the misery of expatriation for five years, and as the verdict against him was only for £25, he thus got a woman's confidence and affection, and possibly some abatement in his hotel bills, at the very moderate price of £5 a year. On the whole we are inclined to think that both the Scot and the Jew supported in these transactions their national characters for shrewdness and a keen regard for self. Their conduct may probably be explained on the universal principle of taking care of number one; and therefore it may be supposed that an observant foreigner would not find himself at a loss to understand the motive of it, by the help of his own experience of human life.

There have been, however, other recent cases, which we look upon as the peculiar growth of British soil. The plaintiff in one of them was the daughter of a builder's foreman and a laundress, dwelling in Morning-lane, Homerton. The girl assisted her mother in ironing the fine things. Up to the age of fourteen years, the plaintiff and the defendant had gone to the same school. We never heard before of education upon so broad a basis as to be capable of embracing the two sexes during almost the whole period over which it would extend. As may be observed in the majority of these cases, everything is proper, not to say precise, at the beginning of the courtship. The first step was, to ask the consent of the lady's parents. Matters were thus put upon the footing on which they continued for six years. The defendant was a copious letter-writer. His prose was neither accurate nor elegant; but then he gradually developed a considerable faculty for rhyming. He had got so far in the sixth year as to be able to produce a sonnet which demanded "a cottage on some Cambrian wild," wherein to lead a contemplative life. As his only means of keeping himself and "Susie" were by wages earned as shopman to a jeweller, and as that is a business not much in request on "Cambrian wilds," the lady's parents might have been justified in demanding some definite explanation of his intentions. It is to be feared, indeed, that as the intellect developed, the moral sense grew weak. The writer of sonnets ceased to feel the obligations of common honesty. Shortly afterwards he wrote that he had seen some one he liked better, and had no desire for the plaintiff's company either on the Cambrian wilds or in Coventry-street, Haymarket. The builder's foreman and the laundress may not have been sufficiently alive to the incompatibility of an intention with the maintenance of their daughter and the children who might be born to her in comfort and respectability. But the defendant's prose at any rate was not above the level of their understandings. He was called upon to fulfil his promise, and on his refusal an action was commenced and a verdict obtained for £40 damages, which we strongly suspect would have been £50, but that one of the jurymen had himself a half-developed yearning after a cottage on a Cambrian wild.

"To pity man's pursuits and shun his ways"

In another case tried in the same week we find not only a poetical, but also a religious element entering largely into the correspondence. The parties dwelt on Bethnal-green. They were engaged three years and eight months, during which they spent usually five evenings of the week together, besides sitting in the same pew in chapel on the Sundays. In forming this connection, in carrying it on, and in breaking it off, the defendant appears to have supposed himself to be acting equally under Divine guidance, which he represented himself to have sought by earnest prayer. This appeal to a peculiar revelation where the ordinary teaching of man's own conscience might suffice recalls to our mind an incident in Venetian history, which may be found in a book lately published. The Pope had laid the Republic of Venice under an interdict, the effect of which was to close all the churches, and to deprive the people of all the offices of religion. The Council of Ten defied the Pope, and determined that the churches should be kept open by their own authority. On Saturday night, however, they felt very desirous to know whether the incumbent of an important church intended to obey their orders or the Pope's. An officer of the Ten accordingly waited on this incumbent to ask him whether it was his purpose to open his church for service on the Sunday morning. The incumbent cautiously answered that this would depend upon how he might be moved by the Spirit at the hour of divine service. A less astute body than the Ten might have been embarrassed by this evasion. They, however, were ready with the reply that nothing could be more proper than the determination of His Reverence to await the guidance of the Spirit in the matter of opening his church—only they thought it well to impart to him their own strong conviction that if the church were not opened the Spirit would move them to hang His Reverence from the steeple of it. We may leave our readers to apply this story to the defendant who broke his promise, and to the jury who punished him for the breach of it.

THE NEW COURTS AND OFFICES.

A pamphlet,* from the pen of a gentleman well-known to the profession, on a subject of very general interest, has just made its appearance. Every person who knows Mr. Gem regrets the retirement from the profession of one of its members so accomplished and esteemed as that gentleman; and all will gladly see each fresh proof (of what they could not doubt) that his interest in its welfare continues with him in his retirement. Mr. Gem's labours in the affairs of the law, and particularly on subjects cared for by solicitors, entitle everything proceeding from his pen to respectful attention. The masterly pamphlet he published nearly twenty years ago on the subject of Courts of Probate was the first practical move towards the abolition of those antiquated absurdities, the old Doctors Commons' Court and her sister Diocesan Courts, and of the race, half-monks half-lawyers, who had the monopoly of the probate business. His efforts in the Concentration of Courts question for nearly twenty years are also well known to all solicitors who have taken any part in that subject. But upon one point connected with this latter measure he has, while most wise and lucid on every other part, always been subject to what we consider a monomania. He is inflexibly convinced that the new courts should be placed in the garden of Lincoln's-inn-fields, and nowhere else in the world. He has always persistently advocated this view. He laid it before the late Commission. The commissioners considered his statement with full respect and attention; and reported against it. The pamphlet now under review is his rejoinder. In favour of Lincoln's-inn-fields there is, first, the saving of cost of site. This Mr. Gem computes at a principal sum, the interest of which would increase the annual rent to be paid by the public (or suitors) for the courts and offices by something less than £5,000 a year—an amount which all who have read the evidence before the commissioners; or, without reading, have considered how many millions are annually expended in court business, will be convinced is not worth a moment's consideration, provided the Incorporated Law Society's site (between Carey-street and the Strand) has the slightest breath of advantage in point of professional convenience. What, then, are the other comparative advantages claimed for Lincoln's-inn-fields?—greater quiet, more light, and less dust, and capacity for future enlargement. Noble position, better access, and the like we think hardly worth mentioning. How far are these claims true, and what are the real advantages of the other site? First, as to the validity of these claims. Except in the article of quiet, there is not only, we think, no validity, but, to a considerable extent, the balance is the other way; and quiet could only be retained in Lincoln's-inn-fields by keeping the fields more or less the inaccessible place for carriages than they are now, and taking care that there should not be those ready and almost essential approaches to the courts there, which, if granted, would be sure to make the fields a great thoroughfare from Temple-bar to Holborn. We will first describe the block of buildings we understand to be intended to be erected for courts and offices on the Strand site. This block would have a sunk basement area all round it, closed from the general public, wide enough for carriages or carts bringing records and documents to be deposited in court, and the like. There is a fall in the level of the ground between the north-east and south-west corners of the proposed area of, we believe, nearly fifteen feet. This difference of level would enable a carriage entrance to the area from the Strand to be readily made; and also would enable the architect to place under the ground floor two stories of rooms looking into the area, if two were desired. The entire centre of the building would, we conceive, be occupied, on the basement floor, with fire-proof rooms for records, lit by gas.

Mr. Gem says that there must be a further depository outside of, and detached from, the building, for records; and on the supposition of his Lincoln's-inn-fields' scheme, he proposes the purchase for this object of a site at the back of the west side of the fields. But in the Strand scheme, a site, and a very large one, and already appropriated to this object, is in existence, and with a much greater facility of approach. Make a tunnel from the north-east corner of the area, under Chancery-lane, and you would find yourself in the basement area of the magnificent new Record Offices on the Rolls estate, and have a perfectly private and safe communication between the new courts and the new depositories, and the Rolls house and the old depositories.

So far for the area of the new block of courts. The ground-floor of the new buildings would be devoted to offices: such offices being respectively placed under the respective courts to which they especially belonged. Over the offices, on the first floor, and running to the height of say eighteen or twenty feet, would be the courts, lighted by skylights. These courts would be so placed that between them and the streets surrounding the whole block of buildings, there would be two floors of rooms, lighted from the streets and shutting off all noise whatever from the courts. The lower of such two floors would be on the level of the courts; the upper, on the level of the galleries of such courts. These two floors would afford abundant private rooms for judges, the bar, &c. &c. There would be separate well staircases between the respective courts and the offices below them, to any extent that could be needed for all public or private access. And the offices on the ground-floor would again have power of expansion by means of well staircases dropping down into those rooms in the basement underneath, which face and are lighted from the great area surrounding the building. In the centre of the block would be one or two open yards, accessible to carriages;—for the use of the judges, &c.; and for better ventilation, and for lighting other rooms, halls or passages to be placed, flanking the yards towards the interior of the block. These open yards would be approached by bridges from the streets, over the area.

It is of the first moment, we conceive, that the courts should be so placed as that, in point of proximity and readiness of access, they could be reached in a minute or two, without check or stoppage, by a barrister coming robed from the Temple. The position of the courts on the first floor would render this essential condition easy of attainment. A covered bridge over Fleet-street, running quite into the Temple (say one from the court immediately on the west side of Middle Temple-lane, or a bridge through the room over Temple Bar, or two or three bridges, if desired), could be carried into the heart of the new block of buildings, to the very doors of the courts themselves. A similar bridge from Lincoln's-inn New-square would also give quiet and uninterrupted access to the equity courts from that Inn. Another advantage of this first-floor position of the courts is that it admits of an unlimited extension of courts in after ages; for to extend them, nothing would have to be done but to purchase block after block of houses on the opposite side of the streets surrounding the building, and without impeding the traffic of those streets, carrying on by covered bridges the congerie of courts in any direction which might be thought desirable. The Rolls estate might in this way be so appropriated. Nay, the very Temple itself might be penetrated by this congerie; and fresh court after fresh court be protruded into its precincts,—should anything so improbable ever be wished. It is this power of making the two Temples wings or riders, as it were, of the courts, which renders the Strand site so incomparably more eligible than the one Mr. Gem patronises.

Mr. Gem's pamphlet rather smacks with an ill flavour of insinuation against the Incorporated Law Society, as if their chief motive in advocating the Strand site was to have the courts near their hall. Mr. Gem could never have intended any such inuendo. He himself might be subject to a retort, as a proprietor of valuable property in Lincoln's-inn-fields; but he is a most honourable and upright man, and has been a great knight-in-armor for all great law-improving enterprises; and willing battle will we ever do with any one who throws the faintest insinuation at him. The society's hall is placed where it is, precisely for the very reason why the courts should be placed where the commissioners propose. It is so placed because its site is between Lincoln's-inn and the Temple; and therefore in the very heart and centre of legal functions. The fact that that noble institution will be vis-à-vis to the new courts is, moreover, a strong reason in favour of the chosen site, because the hall is very much to solicitors what the inns of court are to the bar.

If we may run near upon a Hibernicism, we will further say, in conclusion, that the best thing in Mr. Gem's pamphlet (good though it be, but in a bad cause) is one line upon the title-page. It is his motto from Bacon—a motto we cheerfully repeat, premising that usefulness, or adaptation to end, is the cardinal element of beauty. Upon its application, viz., whether it should be a warning to him or to us, we put ourselves (as the entries run) upon the country, &c.

"He that buildeth a fair house upon an ill seat committeth himself to prison."

ANDERSON'S CASE.

The obligation of England to deliver up Anderson to the United States must be decided by the treaty where its provisions are plain, and by principles of international law where the treaty is silent or doubtful.

The treaty is popularly considered as expressly declaring that the question of crime or no crime must be determined by the law of the place where the fugitive is found, as distinguished from the law of the place where the act complained of has been committed. This, to say the least, is a very extraordinary view for any reasonable man to take; for it involves the supposition that each country has stipulated for the delivery up of offenders against the laws of the other country—a stipulation which, it is plain, neither country had the slightest interest in making.

Independently of this, the construction alluded to cannot be supported.

1. Because the first part of the 10th clause of the treaty contemplates charges of crimes committed in the country demanding extradition.

2. Because what is a crime in such country can only be determined by the laws thereof, and the government of such country has no concern with offences against any other laws.

3. Because the treaty is framed for the mutual advantage of both countries, and its spirit is this:—Give us up certain offenders against our laws, and we will give you up similar offenders against your laws.

4. Because the proviso in the treaty applies in terms only to the evidence in support of the charge, and not to the criminality of the act alleged to have been committed; and that proviso is complied with by proving the law making the act complained of a crime in the country where it was committed, and by proving the commission of such act by the person accused.

5. Because to construe the proviso as applying to the question of crime or no crime is inconsistent both with the previous words of the treaty and with its general design; for such a construction leads to one of these two conclusions, viz., either, first, that the right to surrender exists wherever what is complained of is a crime (i.e., one of the specified crimes) according to the law of the place where the fugitive is found; or, second, that the right to surrender exists only where what is complained of is a crime (i.e., one of the specified crimes) both by the law of the country where the fugitive is found and also by the law of the country from which he has fled. The first conclusion proves too much; for it would render extradition obligatory, though no offence had been committed against the Government demanding extradition. The second conclusion proves too little; for it would not render extradition obligatory, even though a most heinous crime against the Government demanding extradition might have been committed. To make this clear, take the following case: Suppose that arrest for debt was lawful by the law of America, but not lawful by the law of England, and that an American subject were duly arrested in America for debt, and were to kill the officer arresting him, and were to flee to England—could it be said that because the law of England did not allow arrest for debt, therefore the American Government would not be entitled to demand the extradition of the fugitive? Such a conclusion is absurd, and demonstrates the unsoundness of the construction which leads to it.

For these reasons the question of crime or no crime cannot be decided by an appeal to the law of the place where the fugitive is found. By what law then is it to be determined? The treaty is silent on the point; and for the answer we must, therefore, appeal to the principles of international law and to the spirit and object of the treaty. Appealing to these, the question of crime or no crime must be determined by the laws of the place where the acts complained of were committed; and the only really debatable question upon the Ashburton treaty is this—whether it obliges each party to recognise all the laws of the other, or only such of them as may not be opposed to its own policy or interest, or to its own notions of right and wrong. Those who contend that the treaty binds each party to recognise all the laws of the other without any qualification or limitation, contend for that which, to say the least, is extremely improbable and unreasonable. Such a construction is apparently so opposed to the interests of both parties, that nothing short of the clearest expression of intention to that effect can warrant it; and were it not for the clause in the Ashburton treaty, enabling either party to determine the treaty without notice, the extensive construction alluded to could not for a moment be supported. But to infer from that clause that either party intended to abandon even for a moment the right to decline to enforce laws repugnant to its own interests and principles is to do much more than the clause warrants; such an intention, had it existed, would have been expressed in language not to be mistaken, and it cannot be fairly inferred from a provision inserted for the purpose of enabling either party to determine the treaty, in case it should think it expedient so to do. The treaty requires each party to recognise the criminal laws of the other; but in the absence of express words to that effect it cannot be fairly interpreted as requiring a more extensive recognition of penal laws than is required in the case of civil laws by what is called the comity of nations.

By the comity of nations, and in the absence of any treaty, one country is in the habit of recognizing those civil laws of another country which are not opposed to its own policy or interest, and are not abhorrent to its own notions of what is right. But the comity of nations does not go beyond that, and it necessarily leaves each country to judge for itself what laws of other countries it will recognise, and what it will not. The treaty does for a certain class of criminal laws what the comity of nations does for civil laws. Provided, then, we are bound to recognise by the comity of nations or by the treaty, the laws of the country where the act complained of has been committed, we must decide the question of crime or no crime by those laws. But if the act complained of is one which is a crime only by virtue of laws opposed to our policy and interest and to our notions of natural justice, then we are entitled to say the alleged crime is no crime, and the treaty does not apply.

Appealing, then, for the determination of Anderson's case to those laws of the United States which on general principles we can be required to recognise, we arrive at the conclusion that no case for extradition is made out; for, allowing the fullest force to the comity of nations, and to the treaty construed by its light, there is nothing to oblige us to recognise the status of slavery or those laws of other countries which treat slaves as things and not as persons. Such laws are opposed to our policy and to our notions of morality, and are abhorrent to our feelings. We hold that every person, in fact enslaved, is, whether in America or not, and whether black, white, or of any other colour, a free man detained in servitude against his will, and is entitled to gain his liberty by any means which may be necessary for that purpose. To treat Anderson as a murderer is, therefore, for us wholly impossible; and to deliver him up is more than the treaty requires us to do.

This mode of dealing with the case does no violence either to the words or to the spirit of the treaty, but gives full effect to both. The popular construction in this country is opposed both to the words of the treaty and to its spirit; and the American construction assumes that the treaty binds us to recognize all American laws, however opposed to our own policy or interest, or to our notions of right and wrong. The treaty, however, does no such thing; and assenting to the fullest extent to the general proposition that the question of crime or no crime must be decided by the laws of the place where the acts complained of were committed, we have a right to add that if we are required to give effect to those laws they must be such as we are bound to recognise by principles of international law.

PRELIMINARY AND INTERMEDIATE LAW EXAMINATION.

Some dissatisfaction has been expressed at the delay which has taken place in carrying out the provisions of the Attorneys' Act of last session, so far as they relate to the examination of articled clerks. The Act, which came into operation on the 28th of August, 1860, enables the chief judges of the common law courts, jointly with the Master of the Rolls, to make regulations for the examination "in such branches of general knowledge as they may deem proper of all persons not having taken degrees or successfully passed university examinations . . . thereafter becoming bound under articles of clerkship;" and the same judges may require such examinations to be passed either before persons so become bound, or before their admission as attorneys. It is rumoured that a considerable number of "ten years' " clerks have, since the passing of the Act, been making a rush into articles for the purpose of avoiding any preliminary examination which may be instituted; and unless it shall be determined to have no test in the nature of matriculation, all those who have obtained their articles since the passing of the Act will have escaped an ordeal to which, according to the opinion of Parliament, as interpreted by its nominees (the judges), they ought to have been subjected.

The Incorporated Law Society, however, although it has not been very prompt in taking measures for giving effect to the statute, has not been altogether idle in this matter. We have now before us the report of a committee appointed by the Society for the purpose of considering what steps ought to be taken towards the introduction of the new system. The report recommends that—

In order to carry into effect the enactment in the 8th section,

That from and after the first day of Term, 186 , every person proposing to enter into articles of clerkship for five years, shall produce to the registrar a certificate either that he has successfully passed the junior middle-class examination established by the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or taken a first-class in the examinations of the College of Preceptors, or has successfully passed an examination by special examiners in London, whom the committee further recommend that the Lords Chief Justices and Chief Baron, jointly with the Master of the Rolls, be requested to appoint, and that such last-mentioned examination take place half-yearly, and consist of two parts.

PART I.

1. Reading aloud a passage from some English author.
 2. Writing from dictation.
 3. English grammar.—Analysis and parsing.
 4. Writing a short English composition, such as a description of a place; an account of some useful or natural product; or the like.
 5. Arithmetic.—A competent knowledge of the first four rules, simple and compound and vulgar fractions.
 6. Geography.—Questions on the geography of the world, but more particularly of Europe, and especially of the British Isles.
 7. History.—Questions on the outlines of English history—eg., the successions of the sovereigns, the chief events, and some account of the leading men.
 8. Book-keeping.
- N.B.—The quality of the handwriting and the spelling in the several exercises throughout the examination to be taken into account.

PART II.

Papers also to be set in the following six subjects, and each candidate to be required to offer himself for examination in two subjects at least, of which Latin must be one, but no candidate to be examined in more than four.

1. Latin.—Translation of passages from Cæsar's Commentaries de Bello Gallico (Books I. & II.), or from Virgil's Æneid (I. & II.). Candidates to have liberty of choice between the two works.

2. Greek.—Translation of passages from St. John's Gospel, or from Xenophon's Anabasis (Book I.). Candidates to have liberty of choice between the two authors.

3. French.—Translation of passages from Fénelon's Télémaque: easy English sentences to be translated into French.

4. German.—Translation of passages from Schiller's Revolt of the Netherlands: easy English sentences to be translated into German.

Besides these translations in the several languages, the candidate to be required to answer questions on the grammar of each selected subject.

5. Mathematics.—Euclid, Books I. & II. Algebra, to simple equations, inclusive.

6. Physics.—The Elements of Natural Philosophy.

It will be observed that the examination here proposed is to be passed before entrance upon articles of clerkship, and is intended to satisfy the requirements of the statute in respect of "general knowledge" only; and so far we think that the committee has succeeded well in its task. The subjects proposed seem to us to be suitable for an entrance examination, and if any improvement can be made in this respect, no doubt a little experience will soon suggest it. But we are extremely glad to learn from the report that the committee has not hesitated to pronounce decidedly in favour of an entrance examination. The statute left that question quite open—the judges being, as we have seen, thereby empowered to fix the time of such examination in general knowledge either before or after admission to articles.

The 9th section of the Act provides for an examination in legal knowledge, pending articles; and in order to carry this into effect, the committee recommends—

That all persons under articles of clerkship executed after the passing of the Act on the 28th of August, 1860, shall be examined, either in the term next before or next after one-half of his term of service, in such elementary works of the laws of England as may be appointed by the examiners; and that the names of the books selected for examination in each year may be obtained from the Secretary of the Examiners in the month of the previous year.

That such intermediate examination shall be conducted in each term in the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, by the examiners appointed under the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 73, the orders of the Master of the Rolls of 13th January, 1844, and the rules of the Common Law Courts of Hilary Term, 1853, at such times as the examiners shall from time to time appoint.

The committee also suggests—

That in case the applicant should fail to pass such intermediate examination to the satisfaction of the examiners, he may attend the examination in the next or any subsequent term; but his examination at the expiration of the term of service under his articles shall be postponed for such length of time, or so many terms, as may intervene between his attempt to pass and his successfully passing such intermediate examination.

And that each person, on giving notice, shall pay a fee of 5s., and on receiving his certificate for such intermediate examination shall pay a fee of 15s.

We entirely agree with the committee in the suggestion that the intermediate examination should have express reference to, and, in fact, proceed upon, elementary text books; and would deprecate any attempt to anticipate the present too discursive and uncertain examination for admission into the profession. The report of the committee has intentionally not pronounced upon the exact period when such intermediate examination should take place—whether it should be before or after the expiration of one half of the term of service. Upon this point we venture to repeat a suggestion which we have already made in these columns. To our mind the best form of intermediate examination would be the professorial form, at least for those who attend lectures at the Law Institution. Every student who has attended two courses of lectures, in distinct departments of law, should be at liberty to present himself at the conclusion, for examination by the lecturers in the subjects of the lectures; and such attendance ought, we think, to be previous to the last year of service, so that there might be some guarantee that the student had not unduly postponed his studies. Such a scheme would not impose any very heavy additional duty upon the lecturers, or much irksome labour upon those articled clerks who now attend at the Law Institution: while it would do much towards securing advantages of which it cannot be supposed that the most is now made. Some provision would, of course, have to be made for the examination of those who do not avail themselves of the lectures in the hall of the Law Society. For them there might be either a separate examination; or there appears to be no reason why they might not be allowed to present themselves for examination by the lecturers. If students who had not attended the lectures could pass the same test as those who had, they would not, perhaps, deserve less credit for so doing, but rather the contrary. What we desire to insist upon mainly is, that the intermediate examination should have distinct reference to a specific curriculum, or course of study, and as much as possible to particular text books; and if to those which constitute the subject of the lectures so much the better.

In reference to the question whether the intermediate examination should take place not only in London, but also in convenient central localities in the country, we agree with the committee in thinking "that there would be very great difficulty in conducting the examinations in different parts of the country, and in applying an uniform test of progress." The committee is of opinion that under proper regulations the expense or peril will not be appreciably greater of attending for two or three days in town than in any central locality in the country; but upon this subject we shall be glad to be favoured with the views of our provincial readers.

THE MARQUIS OF BUTE'S CASE.

The Court of Chancery in England, and the Court of Session in Scotland, are fiercely contesting which shall have the custody of the Marquis of Bute—a boy, we believe, about thirteen years of age, enjoying an income, it is said, of £100,000 a-year, derived from land in both countries. On the death of his father, the late marquis, in 1848, his mother was appointed guardian of his person by the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. The marchioness died in the autumn of 1859. At this period the young marquis was residing in his own beautiful island of Bute. The Vice-Chancellor Stuart was applied to, and appointed Major-General Stuart and Lady Elizabeth Moore to succeed the marchioness in the guardianship. At first these two selected individuals proceeded most harmoniously. Lady Elizabeth brought the marquis to London to be delivered to her colleague, who was supposed the fittest to superintend and direct the education of the young nobleman. The major-general, it appears, intended to enter him forthwith at Eton. The Vice-Chancellor Stuart approved of this arrangement; but Lady Elizabeth Moore was of opinion that some preliminary training would be proper, as the boy was delicate and a little backward in his attainments. She had been a great friend of the late marchioness; and evidently had a very strong attachment to her charge. In these circumstances no other way occurred to her to save her own terrors and to comply, as she said, with the child's entreaties, but the obvious though bold course of starting with the marquis by a night train, and thus restoring him to the land of his birth, and as it appears of his affections. Here undoubtedly was a contempt of the Court of Chancery; a very great offence in the judgment of all at Lincoln's-inn—but perhaps a not very unnatural proceeding in the eyes of the world at large. Once in Scotland, the marquis and Lady Elizabeth thought themselves safe. But the major-general pursued them. Foiled in his efforts to get back the child, the worthy soldier complained to the Vice-Chancellor Stuart, who, being himself a Caledonian, felt that he owed a double allegiance—to the laws of his dear native country on the one hand, and to the laws of England, which he had sworn to vindicate, on the other. Duty prevailed in the mind of this eminent magistrate; and we understand he has not failed in asserting and carrying to their full extent the principles on which his Court acts, in that important branch of its jurisdiction which embraces the care of those who cannot take care of themselves. In a word, the Vice-Chancellor discharged Lady Elizabeth Moore from the guardianship; ordered her to surrender the child to the major-general, who was continued in the guardianship; and finally directed that, if necessary, an application should be made to the courts in Scotland for assistance. Lady Elizabeth Moore refused to deliver up the child. The Court of Session was then applied to: but that Court demurred, stood on its own dignity, and doubted whether it was befitting that a supreme tribunal should "register the decree of a foreign jurisdiction" without "examining its propriety." A difficulty presented itself. The order of the Vice-Chancellor was not so authenticated as to make it necessary for a court of justice to second it without paying some attention to the circumstances of the case, and some regard also to the feelings of the young marquis. The Court of Session declined compliance with the major-general's application, the more decidedly because there was in Scotland a proper functionary duly authorized to protect the marquis's person, the "Tutor-at-law;" who had, in fact, been appointed to his office before the appointment of the English guardians, and when the pupil (so the Scotch lawyers term a boy under 14) was actually resident in Scotland. The result is that this young scion of a most ancient Scotch noble family (descended from Celtic kings) is still in Scotland. Leave has been granted to appeal to the House of Lords against the order of the Court of Session, and this appeal will soon be heard. The case of Beattie v. Johnstone, 10 Cl. & Finn. 42, comes very near the Bute case, and will, no doubt, influence the decision of the House of Lords in the pending appeal. Meanwhile we must content ourselves with thus noticing the issue raised, without entering upon the merits of any argument on either side.

THE DEED CLAUSES OF THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

This Bill goes buoyantly through the troubled waters of committee. The Attorney-General is reaping the reward of the months of long-vacation labour, which, notwithstanding last year's Bill was a consolidation, and this year's is only an amendment, he informed the House that he had bestowed upon the present measure. But no amount even of the Attorney's skilful exertions in fitting the details together will avail to secure a practically successful result, unless all the main features of the new system be in harmony with the principle which has been its ground of introduction. This ground has been so well understood, and so fully recognised throughout the agitation for the reconstruction of the Bankruptcy Law, that it was scarcely necessary for the Attorney-General to tell his hearers, on moving for leave to bring in the Bill, that the principle on which he thought the law of insolvency should rest was this—that the moment a man becomes insolvent his estate belongs to his creditors, and that the creditors, as a body, should be consulted upon the mode of administering it and disposing of it. Under the old system a whole legion of officials were employed in destroying the very property which it was their sacred province and duty to respect; and this was one of the evils which it was the object of both the last and present Bills to remove. The Attorney-General might have declared it to be the one object. The complaint is not that the bankruptcy law, as law, is badly administered, or works injustice either to the debtor or the creditor; but that in administering the law thirty-three per cent. is levied on estates for the purpose of paying compensations and supporting the expenses of the Court. Accordingly, the attempt which failed last session of throwing £20,000 a year of compensation on the Consolidated Fund has now been renewed with success against Sir H. Willoughby's opposition.

Such is one mode by which the 33 per cent. is to be lightened. But for reduction of the heavy percentage the main reliance is placed on the increased power to be given to the creditors' assignee and the creditors themselves, in administering the bankruptcy. If a majority in value at any meeting thinks that a proposal of the bankrupt should be accepted, or that no further proceedings should be taken, there is to be an adjournment; and, upon a resolution of three-fourths in value present at the adjourned meeting, the bankruptcy proceedings are to be suspended, and the estate is to be wound up as the majority shall direct. On the election of a creditors' assignee, the powers of the official assignee are to cease, and the estate is to be divested out of him, and vested in the other assignee; and the creditors at the meeting will be at liberty to appoint a manager of the estate, and determine upon his remuneration. The creditors' assignee is to realize the estate, and make the requisite payments into the bank, upon a resolution of three-fourths in value of the creditors at a meeting. He is to have a power of mortgaging and pledging the estate to pay debts owing by the bankrupt; and, after twelve months, he may sell the book debts and goodwill. Creditors will be enabled to prove by delivering, or sending by post, a statement of account to the creditors' assignee, accompanied with a declaration.

It will have struck the reader that, so far, the new system will in effect approach very nearly the state of things under a composition deed. And later in the Bill come, not unexpectedly, provisions from which the Attorney-General expects special advantage to the estate. He declared in the House that an evil of the present law is, that when once the creditors are within the walls of the court, they cannot escape until the estate is administered to the uttermost farthing. They are compelled to remain there until the whole is "ground down and administered." Accordingly, in the Bill, under a heading "As to change from bankruptcy to arrangement," are clauses by which, at the first meeting after adjudication, or any meeting called for the purpose, three-fourths in value of the creditors may resolve that the estate ought to be wound up under a composition deed, and that an application should be made to the Court to stay the bankruptcy proceedings. The registrar will report the resolution to the Court, which will have power to order accordingly, and to give directions for the interim management of the estate. During the stay of the proceedings, a deed of arrangement, signed by three-fourths in value of the creditors, will be produced in the Court, and the Court, after such a hearing and inquiry as may be necessary, will, if satisfied, direct the deed to be registered with the Chief Registrar, and, if he thinks fit, will annul the bankruptcy. The registered deed will bind all the creditors.

So far the Bill no doubt does give effect to the cardinal principle that the estate ought actually, as well as theoretically, to belong to the creditors, and, therefore, to be kept as much as possible out of the reach of the "pickers and stealers" of the legion of officials. As regards the above provisions, nothing, it is admitted, can have a more wholesome tendency. Not only would they allay the instinctive dread which creditors have of Basinghall-street and its branches, but they are also in accordance with the teaching of experience in the winding up of the estates of persons unable to meet their engagements. Upon an examination of statistical details, in the year 1858, and for some years previously, it appears that the number of adjudications was to the number of composition deeds in a ratio of not more than one to seven. In 1858 the numbers were 660 and 8,000. This session the Attorney-General stated the proportion at 1,000 to about 10,000.

Now, inasmuch as any one creditor of a sufficient amount can drive an insolvent trader into the Court of Bankruptcy, the inevitable conclusion from these statistics is, that in at least six out of every seven cases no Bankruptcy Court or official tribunal beyond the ordinary law and equity courts is wanted at all. And when we consider how many estates, which some early circumstance in the bankruptcy forces into the court, would afterwards, if they could, come out from it to escape being "ground down and administered" there, we may fairly divide the whole number of insolvent cases into the relative numbers of one requiring official interference and nine that prefer to dispense with it. The object, therefore, of any system of administration of bankrupt estates, where the professed policy is to allow the creditors to manage the affair themselves, when they are able, ought to be to provide for the one-tenth and leave the nine-tenths free. Any interference with the nine-tenths, whether for the advantage of the one-tenth, or for the benefit of the nine-tenths, must from the nature of the case do a great deal more harm than good. Yet this Bill, when it has liberated the estate, on the execution of a composition deed, detains in the vestibule, as it were, of the court, the deed and all the persons concerned. The Court is still to have jurisdiction to entertain any application of the bankrupt, or of any party to the deed, or of any creditor or person claiming to be one, respecting the winding up of the estate, or the execution of the provisions of the deed, or the trustees' accounts, or the taxation of the costs or charges of any person employed under the deed, or generally for the decision of any question. And for these purposes the Court is to have the usual powers of summons and examination, and compelling production of books and documents. It is easy to foresee what will be the consequence of this facility of application to the court. There will be no more confidence or reliance placed in the trustees and their legal advisers than there will be responsibility felt by them. The deed instead of being regarded as a final arrangement to be worked out in its own strength, with mutual concession and forbearance, will be regarded by every disappointed, choleric, crochety, or self-interested creditor or agent as a technical introduction to a locus standi in the court. At present questions upon such a deed are litigated in the ordinary courts of law and equity, and doubtless, there is an occasional break down, and a heavy expense. But that such an event does not so often occur as to interfere generally with the efficacy of the arrangements made, is best proved by the great number of the cases in which such arrangements are adopted. Under the proposed system, the estate will certainly not be eaten up by any large mouthfuls; but will it not be gradually nibbled away? We are at a loss to conceive how the Attorney-General will justify these provisions for enabling the debtor or creditor or any other party involved to "pass over the boundary" (as the Attorney-General expressed it), which he has set for himself in assenting to the deed. Has it ever been heard that creditors who agree to settle their bankrupt's affairs out of court have raised or taken up the outcry against the bankruptcy law, as a law which injuriously excludes them from the jurisdiction and protection of the Court?

All, however, that has been said above, respecting change from bankruptcy to arrangement is trifling, when compared with what follows. Indeed, it might be plausibly argued that a matter once in the court ought ever after to be held with the official tether. Perhaps, too, the instances of such change are not very numerous.

The great intractation which this Bill makes of the principle of the proposed reform, and to which we would chiefly draw attention, is that the new bankruptcy Scylla will suck in the whole of the hitherto free 10,000 deeds of arrangement, apparently for no useful purpose in reality, unless to cast them up again—

"Vorat hæc raptas, revomitque carinas."

Under the trust deed clauses, every instrument between a debtor and his creditors or a trustee, relating to the debts or liabilities, and the debtor's release, and the distribution, winding up, and management of his estate, or any of such matters, must not only be left, with an affidavit of execution and a statement of the property and credits, at the chief registrar's office, for execution, and the particulars of the instrument be entered in a book, and the instrument itself be registered in the Court of Bankruptcy; but, after the registration, the instrument, and the debtor creditors and trustees will, in all matters relating to the estate and effects, be subject to the jurisdiction of the court, and be liable to all the provisions of the Act, in the same manner as if the debtor had been adjudged a bankrupt, and the creditors had proved, and the trustees had been appointed creditors' assignees under the bankruptcy. Further, the trustees and the creditors will, as between themselves, and as between themselves and the debtor, and against third persons, have the same powers, rights, and remedies as may be exercised by assignees or creditors with respect to the bankrupt or his estate in bankruptcy. Were these clauses expected to be worked according to their overt intent and meaning, the carrying out an arrangement by deed would be nothing more than a judicial bankruptcy administration under the general law, modified by and perhaps entangled with the self-imposed law of the provisions of the instrument. We will not do such injustice to the intellect of the Attorney-General as to suppose that he has committed the elaborate blunder of contemplating such a result. This is not a case of blunder, but of something else less abhorred in public affairs. The real motive for dragging trust deeds into the bankruptcy vortex is financial. The Bankruptcy Court, being itself almost bankrupt, is to be relieved in two ways—first, by the aid of the Consolidated Fund; secondly, by a tax on all insolvent estates—the last subject, one would think, capable of bearing the burden. Because it is necessary that in insolvencies where fraud, mala fides, or criminality is suspected, or where personal rancour or obstinacy becomes indomitable, or the magnitude of the crash is appalling, recourse should be had to a half-ruined court; therefore, to avert entire ruin, everything, however innocent, trustworthy, and facile, that has the odour of bankruptcy, must pay tribute to this court. For no instrument of arrangement is to be registered, or therefore to bind the creditors, unless, in addition to the ordinary stamp, it has a stamp computed according to the following rule—that is, £2 for an estate under £500; £5 under £2,000; £10 above £2,000. Taking the moderate average of £4, the revenue derivable to bolster up bankruptcy finance will be the nice total of £40,000 a year—no, not the total, for there will still be the official bone-picking, if any of the parties concerned are weak or wayward enough to call into play the new protecting jurisdiction.

We protest, then, against this dexterous attempt to raise out of the great majority of insolvencies, which require no official assistance, a fund to keep Basinghall-street in heart, while experiments are being tried upon its constitution for the benefit of the small minority. Not only will the proposed deed clauses of the Bill, in their administrative operation, be a flagrant breach of the sound principle of bankruptcy law, and of the avowed principle of the present measure, but in accomplishing their fiscal purpose, they will work a great injustice. The financial difficulty of the Bankruptcy Court must, if the present fees and other good things are to be cut down, be met by the House of Commons in an honest spirit. We willingly acknowledge the Attorney-General's difficulty. He has various interests to conciliate. But nothing can justify him in promoting legislation that will bring transactions into her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy for the purpose of swelling its income—legislation which, by its socialistic indulgence on the one hand, and its tyrannical coerciveness on the other, is no less debasing than oppressive to the subject.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

VII.

OF DOMICIL OF ORIGIN.

The chief difficulty which occurs in the divisions of the subject of domicil arises from the manner in which every part of it is mingled with the other; all that can, therefore, be done is, to make that portion of it under discussion the prominent feature, and all the others that necessarily arise in immediate connexion with it subservient and conducive only to illustrate and bring it forward. I look upon domicil of origin and birth to be identical, because no man's legal history can be carried back further than his birth; and the domicil of origin must be coeval with that period, for it is the first he has, and which he must have immediately upon his birth; for even if he happens to be born on ship-board, or on a journey, the moment he comes into existence, his father's domicil becomes his, but if his father be not then living that of his mother. Vide Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 750. The only real distinction is, as to the place of birth. Reg. v. Sutton under Brailes, 25 L. J. M. C. 57. An illegitimate child can, of course, have no father, legally speaking, and, therefore, cannot follow the domicil of its natural father; but as the mother is certain in spite of the rule, hæres nemini so far as his domicil of origin is concerned it would be the domicil of the mother.

The French law differs considerably from ours in this respect; for although a child may be born of a single woman, yet if she afterwards marries the natural father, it is possible to render it legitimate by certain forms to be gone through; for the law of France recognizes the possibility, or rather assumes the existence of an inchoate contract to marry the party at the time of conception. Supposing there be, then, no legal impediment to such marriage, and therefore, if the father or mother at that period be in such a condition that they cannot legally marry, the child then conceived cannot afterwards be legitimized.

It has been considered that a domicil of origin and birth may be distinct, but it is very difficult to explain wherein this distinction lies, and at all events, when events make it at last obligatory to refer to the first domicil, it matters very little what we denominate it, whether we call it domicil of origin, or domicil of birth. Patris originem unusquisque sequitur. Cod. lit. 10; tit. 31; l. 36. Code Civile, Art. 76.

With respect to the question of legitimacy, domicil is a very important matter in the case of individuals who acquire property in a country not that of their birth, and die intestate and unmarried seised of such property. Thus the laws of France and of Scotland legitimize individuals not born in lawful wedlock, who, according to our acceptation of the term, would be bastards or illegitimate. In the first case this is done by means of certain "acts," as they are called, and in the second by the mere fact of the parents subsequently marrying: According to the laws of these two countries, an ante natus is to all intents, and for all purposes rendered legitimate, and amongst the rest, of course, in relation to the title to property, either purchased by him, or coming from him, and is in fact on the same footing as pos' nati, if there be any. Nay more, the laws of this country recognise the legitimacy of an ante natus, and he is indeed regarded as legitimate all over the world, personally, although the laws in force in England as to the transmission of real estate remain in force as much against him as against any other person born in England of English parents not in lawful wedlock. This is one of the great causes of incapacity to inherit, and no statute which has at present passed has, that I am aware of, in the least altered the general law upon the subject. Thus when a party is designated as "heir," "issue," "ancestor," or any other relation, it must be taken, I apprehend, to mean according to the law of England.

A recent case upon this subject In re Don's Estate, 5 W. R. 836, fully illustrates this. David Don, a bachelor and a native of and domiciled in Scotland, cohabited with Elizabeth Hogg, a spinster, and also a native of and domiciled in Scotland; and a son was born of that connexion. In the course of the next year, the parents married, whereby, according to the law of Scotland, the son, who was named David Don, was rendered legitimate. Years rolled on, and David Don the younger, having come to man's estate, left Scotland, and settled in England at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where he purchased real estate, being land with erections upon it, and part of a street in the town, and, being so possessed, and for aught that appeared to the contrary domiciled in England, died intestate and unmarried. David Don the elder, upon the assumption that David Don the younger was his legitimate son, not only according to the law of Scotland but also of England, entered into and possessed such real estate, and continued in possession until the Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, under the powers of an Act for the improvement of the town, took the land compulsorily. Upon the investigation of the title the dates of birth and marriage of course disclosed the true state of affairs, and the important fact came out that David Don the younger was legitimized only, and, therefore, according both to the Scotch and English law, not, previously to the marriage of his parents, legitimate, although rendered so by the law of Scotland, and so far a domiciled Scotchman until he was capable of gaining a domicil of election. The only mode in which David Don the elder could make out his claim was under the modern English law of inheritance, whereby the father is heir to the son, on the ascending principle; and therefore his title rested on the ground that David Don the younger was his "issue;" but the title being thus considered very questionable, the Corporation of Newcastle paid the purchase-money into court under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and upon the usual petition by the landowner for payment out of court, (in this instance David Don the elder being petitioner) the question was fully discussed. On his behalf it was admitted that he had no title except under the Inheritance Act, 6 & 7 Wm. 4, c. 108, s. 6, but that inasmuch as that Act spoke generally of the "lineal ancestor inheriting from his issue," which David Don the younger undoubtedly was, being recognised as legitimate both by this country and by the law of Scotland, whether he was a domiciled Scotchman or not, it followed that David Don the elder could make a good title to the land. On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the Crown, that the term "issue" meant "issue capable of inheriting according to law," and that therefore, David Don the elder could not be heir to David Don the younger, because although recognised as legitimate for general purposes, he was not so legitimate as that any one could inherit land from him, except his own issue. After a lengthened argument, and judgment reserved, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, before whom the petition was heard, decided that the petitioner was not entitled to the money representing the land. This learned judge, distinguished alike for the untiring patience as well as for the sound discretion which he extends to every point brought for his decision, entered most elaborately into the consideration of the analogy of the English and Scotch law, and held that, although beyond all doubt in Scotland, an anti natus, born of parents domiciled in Scotland, was rendered by the subsequent marriage of those parents legitimate not only in Scotland but all over the world, still he was legitimate only as to his personal status, and not recognised as capable of inheriting real estate in England, nor, as a necessary consequence, could the converse right of land being inherited from him hold good. This was his Honour's view of the question, irrespective of the Inheritance Act, and he was further of opinion that, under that statute the rights were not altered; and the word "issue" meant "issue capable of inheriting according to law." The domicile of all parties was assumed to be in Scotland, and it was not necessary to consider the questions that might have arisen had the domicils been different, and hence the fact of David Don the younger having acquired an English domicile (if he did so) was not discussed. The case was a perfectly new one, and, as might be supposed, every possible authority was brought to bear that could be discovered, into many of which the question of domicile largely entered, and, inter alia, an old brief and proceedings in a suit of Read v. Keith were produced which had been before his Honour when master, the present production of which caused him (as he said) considerable embarrassment. In that case, a Scotchman had emigrated to America, cohabited with a woman, by whom he had two daughters, and afterwards married her, possessed some 200 acres of land in America, where he acquired a domicile, and died there intestate. The land was claimed by the daughters as legitimized by the subsequent act of marriage; and the question being raised before the master, he had thought them entitled to the land, upon the ground that they were rendered legitimate according to the Scotch law by their parents' subsequent marriage. It did not appear that that decision had ever been called in question, and therefore, certainly, so far, it was an authority. In referring to the production of this case, his Honour said that considering it was the mere decision of a master, (more particularly when it was considered that that master was himself,) he had no hesitation in declaring that it was a wrong decision, and the circumstance of the case did not vary the principle upon which all such cases must go, namely the lex loci rei sita.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

SECOND COURT.

Feb. 26.—Special Jurors.—As soon as the judge took his seat there was a general clamour made by the special jury who had been summoned in the case of Peyton v. Barendale, which had been second in the list for this court on the previous day. They said they went away yesterday under the expectation that this case would have been first in the list for this court this morning, but upon coming here they found that another case was put before it; they had been in attendance several days, and it was a very great grievance that gentlemen should be brought from their homes or their business in this manner.

The JUDGE said he was very sorry for them. He had not anything to do with making out the lists, but he had no doubt there were very good reasons for the list being made out as it was. He must take the list as he found it.

The special jurors having again complained,

The JUDGE said it was matter entirely for the Legislature; the Jury Acts might be remodelled. If the special jurors would cause their grievance, if they knew what it was, to be laid before the Legislature, every one connected with the law would be pleased if they could have a remedy.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Feb. 26.—At the sitting of this court Mr. Coleridge, upon his lordship's invitation, took his seat within the bar as one of her Majesty's counsel.

SPRING ASSIZES—NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

CARLISLE.

The commission was opened in this town on the 21st ult.

NEWCASTLE.

Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice Keating opened the commission in this town on the 27th ult.

HOME CIRCUIT.

HERTFORD.

The commission for this county was opened on the 28th ult. by Mr. Justice Wightman.

OAKHAM.

Mr. Justice Crompton arrived in this town on the 26th ult. and opened the commission. There were only two criminal cases for trial, and there was no business on the civil side; and the Court rose about 12 o'clock on the 27th.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

Feb. 24.—The February session of the above court commenced to-day before the Right Hon. W. Cubitt, M.P., Lord Mayor of the city of London; Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., the recorder; Alderman Sir F. G. Moon, Alderman Finnis, Alderman Challis, and Alderman Rose; Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Luak, and Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton.

The number of cases for trial were very large.

Mr. George Augustus Bragg, of Moretonhampstead, Devon, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

Mr. Zachariah Mellor, of Rochdale, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

Thomas Wheeler, of the Middle Temple, LL.D., has been called to the degree of a serjeant-at-law.

Parliament and Legislation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, Feb. 25.

CHANCERY LUNATICS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a Bill for the better management of lunatics under the care of the Court of Chancery. The first object of the Bill was to facilitate the disposal of the property of lunatics, and to lessen the expense attaching to the operation, which was at present considerable. Again, a lunatic had now the right of claiming a second inquisition, and the result was that he was often made the tool of persons whose object was only to multiply costs. The Bill proposed that, after the first inquisition, it should be in the discretion of the Court to grant a second inquiry.

Thursday, Feb. 28.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, Feb. 25.

TRADING COMPANIES.

Mr. MURRAY asked the Attorney-General whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce the Bill brought from the House of Lords last session, for the incorporation, regulation, and winding up of trading companies and other associations; and whether he did not think it would be advantageous to the House to discuss it in connexion with the Bill for Amending the Law of Bankruptcy and Insolvency.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he regretted very much that the Bill had not been laid on the table of the House. His right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade was very unwilling to trust it out of his own hands, but he had no doubt that he would very shortly bring it forward.

BANKRUPTCY.

This Bill was again proceeded with, the House having reached as far as the 19th clause. Most of the clauses were agreed to with but slight amendment.

The Bill will be considered again on Monday next.

RECOVERY OF DEBTS.

Mr. HODGKINSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to prevent frivolous and fictitious defences to actions for recovery of debts. The Bill was founded in some measure on the Bills of Exchange Act of 1855. He did not propose to proceed the full length of that Act, which required that a debtor should go before a judge and satisfy him that he had good ground of defence. He proposed that every debtor should be allowed to enter an appearance, provided he made an affidavit that he had a good defence to the action or some part of it.

Mr. HADFIELD seconded the motion.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL did not oppose the introduction of the measure, but he said the procedure recommended was identical with or analogous to the procedure on bills of exchange. He thought that in practice considerable difficulties would be found in the application of the proposed improvement. He agreed in the object of the Bill and should be glad to see it carried out in a manner that would be free from objection.

Mr. MCMAHON opposed the Bill.

Leave was given to introduce the Bill.

Wednesday, Feb. 27.

LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

This Bill passed through committee.

LAW COSTS.

Mr. DIGBY SEYMOUR obtained leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to costs in actions in the Superior Courts of Common Law.

The Bill was read a first time.

CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.

On the motion of Mr. Walpole this Bill brought down from the Lords was read a first time.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

Mr. WALPOLE moved the first reading of this Bill, which has passed the House of Lords.

Agreed to.

Friday, March 1.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Mr. DISRAELI asked a question relative to the Royal commission recently appointed to inquire into the custody and management of the funds of the Court of Chancery. Adverting to the gentlemen who composed the commission, he remarked that if it were not for the name of Lord Kingsdown, the commission must be looked upon with unmodified apprehension.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said the commission had been appointed with a view of giving the best security to suitors and to the public.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

A BILL TO AFFORD FACILITIES FOR THE BETTER ASCERTAINMENT OF THE LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES WHEN PLEADED IN COURTS WITHIN HER MAJESTY'S DOMINIONS.

This Bill provides that courts within her Majesty's dominions may remit a case, with queries, to a court of any foreign state with which her Majesty may have made a convention for that purpose, for ascertainment of law of such state.

And that the court in which such action depends is to apply such opinion.

And that courts in her Majesty's dominions may pronounce opinion on case remitted by a foreign court.

A BILL INTITULED AN ACT TO AMEND THE LAW REGARDING CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE TO PURCHASERS AND MORTGAGEES.

It is proposed by this Bill to enact that no purchaser for valuable consideration or mortgagee shall be bound by any implied or constructive notice of any charge, or of any other act, matter, or thing, affecting the title to the property purchased or taken in mortgage, unless the Court shall be of opinion that the conduct of such purchaser or mortgagee amounted to fraud.

Recent Decisions.

EQUITY.

RECTIFICATION OF SETTLEMENTS.

Thompson v. Whitmore, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 297; Elwes v. Elwes, V. C. S., 9 W. R. 307.

The principles of equity which regulate this subject are few and simple; but the circumstances which control their application are generally intricate. Difficulties arise from what are supposed, or are maintained to be, imperfect expressions of intention; or from the absence of all definition of obligations which were understood, or are alleged to have been understood, to exist between members of a family. Evidence, also, is often scanty, after a period of years has elapsed during which the deed was unimpeached. The results of two recent suits for rectification may be worthy of attention, in both of which the Court refused its aid to the complaining parties. In the former instance, the property, which was personal and came from the wife's family, was settled upon trusts of an ordinary character for the wife for life, and for the children and husband. But the settlement contained this proviso; that "in case there should be no child of the marriage, or being such, all should die under twenty-one and unmarried in the lifetime of the wife, then, if the husband should survive the wife, the trustees should stand possessed of the sum of £4,000, in trust for the wife's brother." It happened that all the children died under twenty-one years and unmarried, but some survived the mother. She died in the husband's lifetime, and he took out administration to her estate. The wife's brother asked the Court to rectify the settlement by striking out the words italicised above, on the ground of mistake. He contended that it was the original intention of the parties, that the trusts should take effect in the event of the death of the children unmarried, either in the wife's lifetime or not. The husband opposed this claim. The Vice-Chancellor in giving judgment, ruled two preliminary points, first, that the wife's brother, though merely a volunteer under the deed, was not thereby precluded from obtaining relief; and secondly, on the evidence, that there had been a clear mistake on the part of the wife. But the actual contest lay between the brother-in-law and the husband, and the evidence seemed favourable to the case of the latter. It appeared that before the execution of the deed, which took place in 1838, the husband objected to the provision in favour of the lady's brother, but, as he was anxious to complete the marriage, he ultimately withdrew his objection. Then, when it turned out that the provision inserted in the deed was not so satisfactory to the brother-in-law as he afterwards wished it had been, and was therefore less unfavourable to the husband than was at first contemplated, there could not be said to have been such a mutual error between the two parties as the Court could rectify. The wife undoubtedly was mistaken; but the mistake was rather favourable than contrary to the husband's intention.

In the latter of the two cases, the general outline of the facts was as follows:—By the plaintiff's marriage settlement in 1826, an estate in tail general was limited to the plaintiff, subject to his father's and his own life estates, and after estates in tail male had been limited to the first and other sons of the plaintiff. The plaintiff afterwards became involved in money difficulties, and applied to his father for assistance. The father assented to the request on the terms that the estates should be limited in the male line exclusively. The plaintiff objected to the entire exclusion of his daughters, and in 1842, the plaintiff's estate tail general was barred (subject to the preceding estates), and a re-settlement made to such uses as the father and son should jointly appoint; and subject thereto to the plaintiff's first and other sons in tail general, with remainder to his first and other daughters in tail general. The plaintiff had only one son, Valentine, who was supposed to be in delicate health; and four daughters. The father's wish to preserve the estates in the male line continued, and in 1846, a deed of joint appointment was executed by father and son, whereby the daughters' estate tail was barred, and a term of 1,500 years was created for raising £100,000 for their portions, in the case of the death of Valentine and every other son of the plaintiff without issue male. This term of years was the subject of the suit. Ten years afterwards, in 1856, the plaintiff's only son Valentine wished to marry; the grandfather having in the meantime died. On this occasion, after much negotiation, a settlement was prepared, whereby the estate tail of Valentine was barred, the term of £1,500 years was destroyed, and the estates were re-settled. Neither the disentailing deed nor the re-settlement made any express mention of the term of years. The plaintiff filed the bill to have this term for the benefit of his daughters restored to the settlement. The decision necessarily turned upon the evidence. It appeared that £100,000 was nearly one-third of the estimated value of the estates. But, what is more remarkable was, that, during the negotiations of 1856, which were carried on behalf of the plaintiff's son, Valentine, by a clergyman, an intelligent man and friend to the family, in whom all had confidence, not one word from first to last was expressed with reference to the term. It seems to have been wholly overlooked. The son, Valentine, long before 1856, was aware of the existence of the charge, but was never asked to keep it in existence. Under these circumstances the Vice-Chancellor very pertinently observed that what was really sought was, "to rectify the oversight of not making any agreement at all on the point in question. No settlement," he added, "has ever been altered or reformed on the ground that a stipulation which was wished or intended by one of the contracting parties, but never agreed to, or even mentioned or brought to the attention of the other contracting parties, has been omitted." From these two cases it may be gathered that want of mutuality in the alleged error, or the omission from the agreement of all mention of the term sought to be supplied, are fatal objections to the case of a plaintiff who seeks to have a settlement rectified.

INTEREST ON ARREARS OF AN ANNUITY.

Booth v. Coulton, V. C. S., 9 W. R. 330.

An application was made to the Court in this case that interest might be allowed on the arrears of annuities, which were given by a testator, by will, to his son, his daughter, and to a stranger. No special case of misconduct or negligence was alleged. The argument advanced was that, under the old law there existed, and that there still exists, a distinction between an annuity given by will, and an annuity granted under contract. The former was argued to be, in principle, a legacy; and upon the arrears of legacies the Court has always allowed interest. The annuity granted for value, on the other hand, was said to be analogous to a debt, and by a rule of the Court was generally treated in the same way as a debt not carrying interest. In favour of the claim, the old case of Litton v. Litton, before L. C. Parker, in 1719, 1 P. Wms. 541, was mainly relied upon. The Court, however, would not admit the distinction as existing at the present day. The cases of Aylmer v. Aylmer, 1 Moll. 87, and Torre v. Brown, 5 Ho. of Lds. Ca. 555, were considered to be conclusive of the proposition that, except under extraordinary circumstances, in the case of a voluntary annuity given by will, interest will not be allowed on the arrears. It is still, however, a remarkable circumstance that the question has never been argued or decided upon the simple question whether, in the distribution of assets as between legatees and annuitants, interest should be allowed to the latter; and the position of annuitants, in respect to this question seems to be so similar to that of legatees, that it is not easy to account for the strong current of authority that has made the law what it is.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

Cook v. Dawson, M. R., 9 W. R. 305.

We are indebted to a correspondent for pointing out, that a portion of our remarks on this case ante, p. 298, is founded on what turns out to be an erroneous view of the Master of the Rolls' observations in the course of his judgment. The passage is "This rule is liable to another exception; where a will contains a devise of land to the executors, then the direction that the debts are to be paid by the executor does not affect the validity of the general charge of debts on his real estate." Whose real estate? Taking the sentence with the context, we were led to suppose that of the testator. Our correspondent points out, what, indeed, the grammatical construction of the sentence alone warrants, that the antecedent to "his," is not the testator, but the executor. It follows that all supposed discrepancy between the Master of the Rolls' judgment and the decision in Harris v. Watkins is removed. The reasoning of the learned judge is also found to be such as leads naturally to the conclusion in Cook v. Dawson, as well as to be in accordance with previous authority.

COMMON LAW.

Bates v. Bates, 9 W. R., C. P., 261.

In a recent number* notice was taken of this case and of the practice under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1832, in actions taken against British subjects out of the jurisdiction. It now appears that the proceedings in that particular action have been stayed by a judge's order—obtained on what grounds the report of the fact does not enable us to state. But we are not sorry to have thus an opportunity of saying a few words more upon the power which under this Act exists, of obtaining against a defendant out of the jurisdiction, a judgment and execution which will operate upon his landed or other property in this country: as the extent of the efficacy of these proceedings acquires considerable importance in reference to the Bankruptcy Bill now passing through Parliament. In a most able and instructive letter† upon this measure, recently addressed to Sir Richard Bethell, by Mr. B. Hoskyns Abrahall, one of the registrars of the Court of Bankruptcy,—which abounds with intelligent suggestions clothed in lively and classical language far from common in disquisitions of this nature—it is asserted that no means at present exist by which the property in this country of a defendant residing abroad, can be reached through the agency of the law. The fact is otherwise in theory, at least, as is exemplified in this very case of Bates v. Bates; but there is little doubt that proceedings against such defendants are seldom instituted; and that, if commenced, they are still less frequently carried to a successful termination. That this is so Mr. Abrahall's statement is itself strong evidence; for taken merely as the opinion of an expert in bankruptcy, it shows conclusively that the power thus recently conferred upon the common law machine, has not yet practically added an additional weapon in defence of commercial interests. It may also be remarked that in the recent debate on the second reading of the Bill, the existence of this mode of proceeding was noticed and urged as an argument against the necessity for any change; but the Attorney-General justified his proposal to subject non-traders to the liability to become bankrupts, on the ground that under the present law, though it was true that if debtors were themselves away from England, their property here might be made available towards the satisfaction of the debt of any creditor or creditors who obtained a judgment,—it was more just, and for every reason more satisfactory, that a creditor's chance of payment should not depend upon his own individual exertions and haste in suing his debtor; but that a judgment obtained against the debtor should benefit all the creditors rateably, as would be the case under the new law.

Correspondence.

MOSE'S CASE.

SIR,—We cannot corroborate the statement in the plaintiff's solicitor's letter to you that he applied for a sight of our clients' title deeds previous to his filing the bill in Bailey v. Lamb; and we subjoin a copy of the correspondence which took place between his firm and ourselves on the subject, and which is also set out in our clients' answer in the suit. The first mention of the deeds was our spontaneous offer to produce them, and the plaintiff's solicitor in no way sought their production.

If any such statement in the Rolls Court respecting the deeds as that mentioned in the plaintiff's solicitor's letter was made it was not made within the hearing either of ourselves or our counsel, and his letter in your Journal is the first information of it which has reached us; and it is, perhaps, scarcely necessary to add that, in the then stage of the suit, nearly all the expenses of it had been incurred, and the substance of the deeds had then been set out in our client's answer.

The excuses in the plaintiff's solicitor's letter in no way modify our clients' views of the vexatious character of the suit as regards themselves. Probably they were not intended to do so, but merely to endeavour to exculpate the plaintiff's solicitors themselves from any supposed breach of their own duty towards their unfortunate client, the deceased plaintiff. Our clients still feel that a grievous wrong has been inflicted on them in the recent renewal of litigation respecting a property which they had previously satisfied Mose's former advisers (by production of the title deeds) to have been bona fide and absolutely our clients' own, and although they were aware the case was still hawked about to a certain class of the profession, they had reposed in the assurance that no solicitor who had notice of the result of the previous production of the deeds would have been found ready to renew the hopeless litigation.

The claimant's story was on the face of it fabulous, and the plaintiff's solicitor himself in his letter to you states that there was "an absence of evidence;" and, so far as the facts had been ascertained, the case was utterly negatived, for in the answer of the Rev. William Jay to the first suit, in which he was interrogated as to Mose's parentage and history, and as to the supposed fact of his having been sent by our clients' ancestors to Mr. Jay for the purpose of being brought up in ignorance of his relations and property, Mr. Jay denied, on oath, having ever known anything of our clients' ancestors, or heard of their existence until informed by Mose's bill, and stated explicitly who and what Mose really was; yet in the new bill the old story and surmises are repeated, and the actual facts as disclosed by Mr. Jay, ignored. Again, one of our clients was charged in the old bill with being the sole devisee and legatee of a person who was alleged to have become possessed of a portion of Mose's supposed property. The fact was that such person gave his property to his wife and seven children, yet in the new bill the same unfounded allegation was repeated, although the will was proved at Doctors' Commons, and open to every one's inspection.

Our clients were put too to the expense of exceptions to their answer, upon trivial points, after their answer had set forth the substance of their title deeds and shown that the plaintiff's claim was utterly unfounded. The allegations of fraud were of such a serious nature, and at the same time our clients' title so absolutely clear and free from all suspicion, that it was unfortunately impossible for them to compromise or listen to terms; and they were left no alternative but to enter at a heavy expense upon the defence of the suit; and so decided were they as to the course which it was their duty to pursue that, although the plaintiff's solicitors proposed a compromise at £1,000, we were obliged to tell them that our clients would not give even 20s.

We are, Sir, yours very obediently,

"Dear Sirs,—Since Mose's bill was dismissed we have produced to two gentlemen who interested themselves and applied to us on his behalf, the documents in our clients' possession to satisfy them that his claim was really without foundation. They were Mr. Macaulay, M.P. and Messrs. Hodgson and Burton, to whom we would suggest your applying before you allow any more of this misguided man's money to be wasted in useless litigation.

"We enclose for your perusal extracts from our letters to our clients communicating the result of the above-named gentlemen's investigations, the bearing of which we have no doubt you will find fully borne out by the gentlemen themselves if you will apply to them.

"We beg further to add that if you are not satisfied with these gentlemen's assurances we have our clients' permission again to produce their deeds to any competent disinterested third person whom we may mutually agree on to say whether there is any foundation whatever for your clients' supposed claim.

"Dear Sirs,—Mose v. Lamb—We have gone very carefully through the pleadings in the old suit and are of opinion that if the facts therein stated are true, the plaintiff has a good case. We have also had a very rigid conference with him as to the evidence in support of his claim and see no ground for doubt. We do not see how any one unacquainted with the details of this most singular case can on inspection of your clients' title deeds found correct opinions as to whether or not his uncle and those claiming under him possessed themselves of property which belonged to the testator under whom our client claims as heir-at-law. We thank you for the offer of inspection, but for the reasons above stated we feel convinced that no third party can do justice to the case.

"Dear Sirs,—Mose v. Lamb.—We think you misunderstand the point with reference to the production of the deeds. Your client alleged that some of the property at Reading possessed by the late Mr. Lamb was the property of your clients' grandfather. An inspection of the deeds would satisfy anyone that it never did belong to such grandfather and that Mr. Lamb acquired it by purchase.

"Our object was partly to save you trouble and from being the instruments of wasting any more of the poor man's money after six previous solicitors had thought fit in turn to throw up the case.

PROFESSIONAL REMUNERATION IN THE UNITED STATES.

We have been favoured with the following extract from a letter recently received by a gentleman well known to the profession in this country from Theophilus Parsons, LL.D., Dane Professor of Cambridge University in the United States.

Cambridge, U.S., A., Feb. 5, 1861.

My dear Sir,—I have read with much interest the documents I received from you a few days since. Our practice, on the points discussed, is so entirely different from yours, that I doubt my ability to understand accurately the questions now in agitation in the profession, or the reason by which these questions must be determined. Nor have I had, for many years, much experience in matters of this kind. In 1848 I accepted the professorship I now hold, and its onerous duties took me at once from the practice of my profession, and I have never resumed.

It seems to me, however, certain that your endeavours tend to some results, which are of much importance, and, perhaps, of equal importance to solicitor and client. One is, that the remuneration for services rendered shall be so definite and ascertainable, that a man may know, within reasonable limits, how much the law expenses of a transaction will add to its cost. Another is, that this remuneration may approach in all cases, the true measure of adequate and proportionate compensation, and, therefore, be just to all parties. Another that it may be determined by rules and principles to such an extent, that the greedy and unscrupulous may not easily victimise their clients, nor the modest and cautious go without fair play. And yet another, that these rules and principles shall not so operate, as to induce solicitors to make a transaction intricate, and in all its steps protracted, that it may be profitable for them. In this country we lawyers have very little difficulty in matters of this kind. The reasons are,—

First, the universal prevalence of the quantum meruit principle;

Secondly, the absence of all stringent rules; for this permits usages on these points to grow out of and depend upon mutual and satisfactory arrangement;

Thirdly, the far greater simplicity of our method of conveyance and trust; and Fourthly, the fact that a vast proportion of the business done in England by solicitors is here wholly outside of the profession; being in the hands of bankers, brokers, land agents, loan agents, or trust institutions. And all of these quite uniformly charge a per centage on the funds in their hands.

Almost all bargains pass through the hands of parties of this kind; and come to lawyers only when the terms are concluded, and the title is to be investigated, or the authority of agents ascertained, and instruments of conveyance or trust to be drawn.

As to the per centage,—that charged by temporary trustees, as executors or administrators for example, whose duty it is to collect and distribute funds, and so terminate their trust, is usually from 2 to 5 per cent. on the capital, and varies according to amount, and circumstances of greater or less trouble or difficulty, or responsibility.

Permanent trustees, who invest and hold funds, and apply the income annually as the trust directs, usually charge about 5 per cent. on the income (estimating a fair amount on the unproductive part of the funds), and this income with us in New England may be put at about 6 per cent., which is, in the New England States, the legal rate of interest.

All charges of this kind, as indeed the whole matter of trusts, is within the powers of our courts of probate, or our equity courts, or common law courts having equity powers. They would probably not interfere of their own mere motion, unless in cases of unquestionable wrong. But our statutory provisions and usages make it very easy for any one who was injured or endangered by a trustee, to obtain a remedy, or a prevention, and usually in a cheap and summary way.

Thus, the principal trust I now hold, is of an estate left some years ago in trust for educational purposes. It amounts to rather more than 600,000 dollars, (£120,000.) The salaries paid to five trustees amount to only 2,100 dollars (£420); of which two-thirds are paid to the managing trustee, who is not a lawyer.

For some years we have been endeavouring to simplify and improve our practice. In some of the States, as in New York, the change is entire; not only special pleading, but all distinction between equity and law being abolished. In Massachusetts, the changes are important, but not so great; and in some of the States the old system remains unaltered.

COPYHOLDS.—PRIVILEGES OF STEWARDS.

A few weeks ago* a correspondent of the Solicitors' Journal made the inquiry whether, in cases where powers of attorney to surrender copyholds are used, it is the province of the steward of the manor to prepare them, or of the solicitor to the vendors. I have, as solicitor to the vendors, under similar circumstances, at the present time, a contention with the stewards of a manor upon the very point, and I shall be glad if any of your correspondents can refer me to any authority upon the question. The practice appears to vary exceedingly in different courts.—I am, yours obediently,

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Can anything be done to prevent the frequent habit of the commissioners to sit in private in some room one can never find? And could one or two of those very elderly gentlemen find out that it is pretty nearly time they retired? I hope the Bill will deal with these matters.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

At a meeting of the Juridical Society held on the 4th inst. the Hon. GEORGE DENMAN, M.P., read a paper on the question:—"Is the Government of the United States of America entitled under the Ashburton Treaty to claim the extradition of the fugitive Anderson?" The early part of it was devoted to an elaborate discussion of the point, whether, independent of treaty, a right to claim the extradition of criminals exists by the law of nations, which, after a full examination of the authorities, Mr. Denman resolved in the negative. After premising that all extradition treaties should be construed strictly, Mr. Denman next proceeded to contend that the effect of the proviso in the Ashburton treaty is, that the question, whether a party is liable to extradition, depends on whether the act he did is a crime by the law of the country where he is found. In the present instance the party was found in Canada; and as by the law of that country slavery cannot exist there, and the offence with which he was charged is dependent altogether on the institution of slavery, no claim for his extradition could be maintained. This construction he considered fortified by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 76; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 120; and the Canadian Extradition Act, 22 Vict. c. 89.

Mr. COLLIER said that extradition treaties were intended solely to meet the case of persons who offended against the law of nature and of nations.

Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN considered that the claim to extradition in this case was well founded, so far as the treaty and statute were concerned, but did not therefore conclude that Anderson ought to be surrendered. The nation should take upon itself the responsibility of saying to America that it had made an unrighteous contract which it could not carry out, and not expect the law-courts to relieve it from the consequences of its error by perverting sound principles of interpretation.

Mr. W. M. BENT was of opinion that the word "murder" in the treaty must be construed according to the meaning of that word in, and the general principles of, international law. He referred to the rules for the interpretation of treaties, &c., laid down by Grotius (book 2, c. 16), and adopted by Wheaton (International Law, 355, 6th ed.) and other writers.

On opening the adjourned discussion on the 18th instant,

Mr. WESTLAKE, observed that, though the question arose on a statute, it was in fact a treaty which had to be interpreted. When a statute recited a treaty-stipulation in its preamble, proceeded to enact provisions expressly for carrying it into effect, and finished by limiting its own duration to that of the clause of the treaty in question, it was plain that Parliament meant what the negotiators and contracting parties meant. It was therefore necessary to disembarass the mind of all narrow methods of construction, such as are sometimes applied to statutes, and to remember that a treaty was a contract between parties who had in their view the established principles of international law, and who were subject to no technical rules, restricting the sources of interpretation from which light might be thrown on the import of the words they used. If, then, a principle of international law could be found which forbade the extradition of Anderson, and one too so well known that the high contracting powers could not be imagined not to have had it present to their minds, it was not necessary to show that that principle was expressly referred to in the treaty or statutes, it was enough that it was not expressly abandoned. Such a principle was this, that even in cases of extradition the criminal law of a foreign country was not recognised merely as such. Grotius, indeed, had thought otherwise. After laying down extradition as a rule, he proceeded to say, "If that of which the refugees are accused be not forbidden by the law of nature or nations, their case will have to be decided by the municipal law of the state from which they come." (II. 21, s. 6.) But this, by drawing attention to the point, had only drawn forth numerous clear opinions on the other side. Vattel gave to extradition no other foundation than the right to punish a crime committed beyond the territory of the punishing power: when such punishment may be inflicted, said Vattel, there is the alternative of extradition; but such punishment can only be inflicted on those who by their atrocity declare themselves the enemies of the human race," (b. 1, s. 233.) The same restriction on extradition was pronounced by Chancellor Kent (1 Comm. 39), who, nevertheless, is well known to have gone farther in favour of extradition independent of statute than the common law of England and America will warrant; and it is incompatible with the extradition of those who have declared themselves the enemies only of a particular foreign law not generally received by civilised men. Dr. Phillimore too says, "there are two circumstances to be observed, which occur in these and in all other cases of extradition:—1st. That the country demanding the criminal must be the country in which the crime is committed; 2nd. That the act done on account of which his extradition is demanded, must be considered as a crime by both states." (Int. Law, v. 1, p. 413.) Also extradition treaties enumerate only grave crimes, and in that between France and Belgium a power is reserved to refuse the extradition, on assigning the reasons, even in special cases of the crimes enumerated. Grotius, in general so profuse in quotation, supports his dictum cited above by one only, and from a play of Æschylus; and the context shows that he regarded the opinion in question as a conclusion from the principle of recognising a foreign personal status, so that its base has long since been cut away, it being well established that even in cases far short of extradition a foreign criminal status is not recognised as a foreign civil one is. Such was the knowledge, and such the ideas, which we are obliged to presume in the parties to this treaty. Where then were the words by which the principle of not recognising a foreign criminal law merely as such was abandoned? If the proviso as to the sufficiency of the evidence which had been so much discussed, was not in favour of Anderson, certainly it was not against him: the argument of the opponents on that head was purely negative. Mr. Stephen had said, on the previous night of debate, that crime was in its nature local; that the mere mention of a murder as committed in Missouri necessarily implied murder by the law of Missouri. The truth, however, was that the authority against which a crime is committed is local, but that there was not necessarily anything local in the nature of the act. If there were, the result would be that the words describing crime could have but a local meaning, and there would be no common meaning of the word "murder" in which the parties to the treaty could be supposed to have agreed; for it was impossible to import into the treaty so many entire clauses as would be requisite to express that the word murder meant one thing when extradition was demanded by one party, and another when it was demanded by the other party. It was necessary to find a common meaning for the word in which the parties had agreed, and such was furnished by the common law, which was the inheritance of the United States as well as of this country. That this law was referred to was further shown by the fact that in our treaty with France, with which we had no system of law in common, certain articles of the French code were referred to as ascertaining the meaning of murder when committed in France. Now, by the common law, murder was "unjustifiable homicide with malice aforethought." So far we were led by legal definitions and maxims equally recognised by the contracting parties, England and the States, and which therefore fixed the sense in which they had used this word "murder," and the conclusion was consonant to the international principle of allowing extradition only in cases of atrocity—cases of crime against humanity. Beyond that, if we inquired what authority it might by the law of either country be justifiable to resist even to the extent of homicide, we reached ground no longer common. This part of the inquiry introduced the Missouri law of slavery. It might be veiled by speaking of "resistance to authority acting rightfully in the execution of the law;" but it was there; and it could never be that, when it was so well settled in our jurisprudence that we did not recognise a foreign slave-law, we should allow such a law which could not pretend to enforcement among us directly to be recognised and enforced indirectly.

Mr. Westlake, having considered the legal merits of the main case, was proceeding to consider what, in the present state of facts, should be done in it; but it was ruled by the chairman that this was beyond the scope of the notice, which was itself extensive enough to occupy the evening.

Mr. F. S. REILLY: I cannot but think that Mr. Denman's detailed examination of case-law, supposed to bear on this question, was a waste of acumen. There is surely no danger now—a days of any man's life or liberty being decided away on quaint scraps out of Ventris, or on vague statements by Mr. Justice Heath of what happened in Lord Loughborough's time. And this, even if there was no treaty. But when there is a treaty, I confess it seems to me clear that all the rights and all the obligations of the parties are to be found within the four corners of the written contract—that in the express stipulations of that instrument are merged all common-law doctrines, all international comity. What, then, says the treaty? Like the former treaty between the same parties it uses the term "murder," purely and simply and without a word of gloss. In an instrument framed by two contracting parties every word must be presumed to be used in some sense intelligible to both, common to both. "Murder" must here mean that something is murder by United States law, and that is murder by English law. I cannot see any reason to look for a tertium quid, as Mr. Stephen thinks necessary, or to go in search, with Mr. Best, of the law of nature. Now there is no doubt the act here in question is murder by United States law. Is it murder also by English law? The chief justice in Canada holds that it is. It seemed to me that Mr. Denman did not grapple closely with the particular arguments of the Chief Justice. I understand the learned judge to say that, whatever supposed cases may be put, here you have the naked case of one man killing another who was endeavouring to arrest him in a manner lawful according to the lex loci, for a purpose lawful according to the lex loci,—the man endeavouring to effect the arrest being as fully clothed by the lex loci with a right to arrest the other as if he had been an officer of the law armed with an express formal warrant in that behalf,—and that such a killing is by the law of England not justifiable, is by the law of England murder. If the case rested there, I humbly conceive there would be much room for argument in support of the Chief Justice's view. It might well, I think, be contended that in cases of this kind the courts of one country are bound to take the law of another country as they find it,—that constituted as they are to administer law as it is, not to apply to the facts before them their own theories of morals, their own conception of the rights of man, they are not called upon to inquire, and would not be justified in inquiring, into the abstract lawfulness of the lex loci, in violation of which the killing was committed,—in short, they must decide such a case as this on the narrow but plain grounds of strict law, without going into the merits of slavery or any other "peculiar institution" of the country where the act was done. This, I submit, and much more than this, might be said, if the case rested there. But happily, as I think, it does not rest there. This is not simply, if at all, a question of technical law. It might never have come into one of the Queen's courts. The treaty can only be put in force by the Secretary of State. A court of law may release a man claimed; it has nothing to do with delivering him up. It may forbid extradition, it cannot enforce it. The matter is a matter of State, of the action of the Executive. The rules for the action of the Executive are to be found not merely in the treaty, but in the Act of Parliament. The Crown can make a treaty, in some sense binding itself and the country generally, but it cannot by treaty affect the liberty of an individual subject. The Act does not confirm the treaty, totidem verbis, so as to give statutory force to the provisions of the treaty. The Act (and this is a very different thing), makes provision for carrying the treaty into effect, and furnishes the machinery for that purpose. If these considerations govern the case, as it seems to me they do, then there cannot be much difficulty about the refusal of this extradition. For, first, when in the Act you find the word "murder" you can have no doubt about its meaning. There is no room here for a treble or a double sense. Here there are not two parties speaking. The language is the language of the Legislature of this kingdom. "Murder" must mean in this Act of Parliament what it would mean in any other Act of Parliament—murder according to English law. Clearly, then, the Secretary of State cannot grant extradition unless he sees there has been a murder according to English law, without having any regard whatever to the law of the demanding State. Next, the Act does not compel the Secretary of State to comply with every demand for extradition, even if technically good under the treaty. He is not bound down by the purely technical consideration which fitted a court of law. He has no need to exercise astuteness to escape from a difficult position; where he is not under a rigid rule, he may take into account all the elements of the case. He may and must look at all the political and social circumstances which surround it. I will put a case, which, though it may seem to be nearly idem per idem, will illustrate what I mean. Suppose the treaty provided for the extradition of persons charged with having committed the offence of adultery; and suppose Utah had been admitted into the union; would not the Secretary of State be justified, as English law and opinion respecting marriage now stand, in refusing to recognize polygamy, and therefore in declining to give up a man claimed as the paramour of the second or any subsequent woman whom a Mormon gentleman had taken to wife, leaving the first? It seems to me that he would, whatever a court of law might say on the subject. And so, if a man were claimed as having committed murder or any other of the specified offences, the Secretary of State would be entitled to refuse his extradition, if it appeared to him that the offence was in substance a political one: and yet neither the treaty nor the Act contained any express saving for the cases of political offenders. Lastly, when you look to this as a question for the Secretary of State under the Act of Parliament, you gain this great advantage, that you can then take into account what passed in the House of Commons when the Act was made. The Attorney-General and the Government declared it was not intended that, under the treaty, slavery and its consequences should be recognised as lawful. Without this declaration it is plain the Act would not have been passed. It was passed, we may say, on that condition. This was a term imposed on the executive as plainly, almost, as if it had been embodied in the Act. Now it is needless to say that in a court of law such considerations are altogether out of place. Again, if the question arose on the treaty simply such ex post facto declarations by one party as to what was intended might be wholly repudiated by the other. But this bargain between the Legislature and the executive, for that is what it amounts to, is most important in the view I am submitting to you. It not only binds the Secretary of State, as between him and the people of this country, but it also justifies him towards the United States when he refuses to assume a power conferred on him—indeed, it might seem by the letter of the statute—but which there is the clearest evidence to shew was never intended to be vested in him, and an attempt to exercise which would render him liable to impeachment. On the whole, then, I would submit that the only safe course is to raise this question altogether out of the region of technical jurisprudence. It seems to me unfortunate that it was ever brought on in a court of law, and I venture to express a hope that it may never again be so. Let it be treated, as what I submit it is, a question of mixed law and politics, not of dry law. Then the minister can legitimately rely on the proved intention of the Legislature. He can appeal to the established political principles of the country in regard to slavery. He can say to the United States, such and such are the reasons why we have not bound ourselves to give this man up. We hope these reasons will satisfy you, and that you will withdraw your demand. Whether you do so or not, however, we will not give the man up; and if, after all, you insist on having him, why, then, you must come and take him.

Mr. C. H. HORWOOD, on the contrary, thought that the construction of the provisions of this treaty was for courts of justice, and not for ministers of state.

Mr. F. M. NICHOLS considered that crime must be understood with reference to the law of the country where the party is found. It is only by the comity of nations that the laws of one country are recognised in another; and this is never done when those laws are in violation of natural justice or decorum.

Mr. VERNON LUSHINGTON, Mr. A. COHEN, and Mr. C. CLARK, also took part in the discussion.

Mr. DENMAN replied, contending that his original views were correct. He stated that the society should discuss the question as jurists, not as statesmen. The proviso in the present treaty was evidently copied, word for word, from a similar treaty between the same countries in 1795. There were but few reported instances of extradition under either Act, some of those which arose in America having gone off on the by-point of whether the claim of extradition had been made by duly authorised persons. A case occurred at Bow-street, before Mr. Hall, in which America claimed a man on a charge of robbery, under circumstances that by English law only amounted to larceny by a servant; and the man was not given up.

TRADE MARKS.

Lord Campbell's Bill, which is now passing through Parliament, affords a favourable opportunity for putting an end to a practice which ought never to have been allowed—that of stamping upon electro-plated wares marks so much resembling those used at the assay offices that the most practised eye, without careful examination, cannot discern the difference. Such an evil was this considered in the last century that in 1773 a Parliamentary inquiry was instituted into the state of the several assay offices in the United Kingdom.

The undue severity of the 16 s., 24 Geo. 3, cap. 53, rendered it perfectly nugatory; for, as life or death depended upon the proof of what was, or was not, an "imitation or resemblance," in the sense of the statute, juries rarely, if ever, would convict upon evidence so subtle and evasive; and the same may be said of the more recent, but milder statute of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 22, viz., that the difficulty, if not impossibility, of defining "imitations and resemblances" to the satisfaction of juries, has rendered this attempt at legislation, as it will all others of the kind, perfectly abortive.

The obvious course is to abolish marks altogether upon base metals, confining them only to the precious metals; but, if any marks are to be used, let them be so decidedly "distinctive" that there shall be no possibility of quibbling upon words.

However, there can be no question, if a Parliamentary inquiry were now to be made in the present state of the assay offices, many important facts respecting marks on metals would be elicited. The Government have as much right to claim protection for their "marks on wrought plate" as any manufacturers or commercial firms have for those by which they distinguish their wares; and, if this cannot be effected in any other way than by restricting the application of any marks to wares made of the precious metals only, the sooner it is done the better.

VACATION BUSINESS AT THE COMMON LAW JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

1st March, 1861.

The following regulations for transacting business at these chambers will be strictly observed till further notice.

Acknowledgments of deeds taken at 10 o'clock.

Original summonses only to be placed on the file.

Summonses adjourned by the judge will be heard at half past 10 o'clock precisely, according to their numbers on the adjournment file, and those not on that file previous to the numbers of the day being called will be placed at the bottom of the general file.

Summonses of the day will be called and numbered at a quarter to 11 o'clock, and heard consecutively.

The parties on two summonses only will be allowed in the judge's room at the same time.

Counsel at 1 o'clock. The names of the causes to be put on the counsel file, and the causes heard according to number.

Affidavits in support of ex parte applications for judge's orders (except those to hold to bail), to be left the day before the orders are to be applied for, except under special circumstances, such affidavits to be properly endorsed with the names of the parties, and of the attorneys, and also with the nature of the application, and a reference to the statute under which any application is made, the party applying being prepared to produce the same.

All affidavits read or referred to before the judge must be endorsed and filed.

Further time to plead will not be given as a matter of course.

THE 29TH CANON OF THE CHURCH.—At the meeting of the Houses of Convocation, on the 26th ult., the Bishop of Oxford moved a resolution that the 29th Canon of the Church, which provided that for each child brought for holy baptism there should be three sponsors—the parents who brought the child for baptism not being allowed to act in that capacity—should be so altered as to allow the parents of the child to act as sponsors, together with one friend in whom they had confidence, thus making the three sponsors required by the rubric of the Church. The resolution was carried without a dissent.

MISSIONARY BISHOPS.—The Queen's Advocate, the Attorney-General, and the Solicitor-General have, upon a case submitted to them by the Archbishop of Canterbury; stated their opinion to be that missionary bishops appointed to exercise episcopal functions beyond the limits of her Majesty's dominions can be lawfully consecrated in this country, but that bishops so consecrated must not assume the status, style, dignity of bishops while in her Majesty's dominions. At the same time they thought that such consecration in this country ought to be discouraged and deprecated.

THE DISPUTED GUARDIANSHIP OF THE MARQUIS OF BUTE.—In consequence of the injunction granted by Vice-Chancellor Stuart against Colonel Stuart, restraining him from prosecuting any further proceedings in Scotland relative to the Marquis of Bute, Lady Elizabeth Moore presented a petition to the Court of Session, praying that court to appoint a tutor ad litem to represent and protect the interests of the pupil in so far as they are affected by proceedings under the petition of General Stuart. The petition stated that this step was the more called for as notices of appeal to the House of Lords had been given by parties both in the Court of Chancery and Court of Session. On receiving Lady E. Moore's petition, the Court of Session appointed Colonel Stuart, tutor-at-law, to lodge a minute; and a minute was accordingly lodged, in which Colonel Stuart stated that he had been advised that he was not prevented by the injunction of the Vice-Chancellor from appearing in the House of Lords, and defending there the judgments of the Court of Session, and that it was his intention to carry the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor by appeal to the House of Lords. In these circumstances the Court of Session on Tuesday refused the motion of Lady Elizabeth Moore, in respect of the statement the tutor-at-law had made.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.—A convention with Sardinia, signed on the 30th of November, and of which the ratifications were exchanged on the 4th of January, has been laid before Parliament. It provides for an international copyright in works of literature or art published in either country—terms which are to comprise publications of books, of dramatic works, of musical compositions, of drawing, of painting, of sculpture, of engraving, of lithography, and of any other works whatsoever of literature and of the fine arts. Besides original works, a translator is to be protected in respect of his own translation. The author of a work is to have for five years the exclusive right of translation, if exercised within a certain period. These stipulations are to apply also to the representation of dramatic works and the performance of musical compositions; but fair imitations or adaptations of dramatic works to the stage of the respective countries are not prohibited, but only piratical translations. Articles from newspapers or periodicals may be published or translated in the newspapers or periodicals of the other country, provided the source is acknowledged, unless (the article not being one of political discussion) the author in a conspicuous manner forbids the republication. Each country retains its right to prohibit, by measures of legislation or police, the circulation or exhibition of any work it may deem it expedient so to prohibit.

PROPERTY AND INCOME TAX.—In England and Wales the property assessed in 1852, under the various schedules, amounted to £234,743,377, and in 1860 it had increased to £282,718,649.

CURRENT TOPICS.

On Thursday evening there was an animated discussion in the House of Lords upon the intentions of the Government in appointing commissioners to inquire into the constitution of the Accountant-General's department of the Court of Chancery, and the provisions for the custody and management of the funds of the court. Elsewhere in our columns will be found as good a report as the conversational tone in which the discussion was carried on permitted. A notion appears to have got abroad that the commission is designed to prepare the way for the appropriation of the Suits' Fee Fund for the New Palace of Justice. But it seems clear enough if the scope of the commission is at all indicated by its title that this notion must be erroneous. The Government, no doubt, considers that the report of the concentration of courts commissioners is amply sufficient to justify the introduction to Parliament of a measure to carry out their urgent recommendations; and we hope there will be as little delay as possible in introducing the Bill for this purpose. The new commission, however, as we understand its object, is simply confined to inquiries as to the banking and financial arrangements of the Court of Chancery. But we hope that either the general scope of the commission will be extended so as to embrace at least the superior courts at common law, or that a new commission may before long be appointed to enter upon the entire subject of legal taxation and of the financial arrangements of all our tribunals, not excluding county and local courts.

The Lord Chancellor's Bill to extend the jurisdiction and to improve the practice of the Court of Admiralty has been read a second time in the House of Lords. The business of the Court has of late increased so much that it has certainly become desirable to adapt the practice to its modern exigencies. Lord Campbell's Bill proposes to extend the jurisdiction of the Court in respect of claims for building, equipping, or repairing ships; for necessities; for damage to cargo imported, and by any ship or barge; for salvage of life; and for wages and disbursements. It is also proposed that the Court shall have jurisdiction over any claim in respect of any mortgage registered under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, whether the ship is under arrest of the Court or not; and that the Court shall have the same powers as are conferred upon the Court of Chancery by that Act. Several of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 are also incorporated in the Bill. When the measure was discussed in the House of Lords upon the second reading, it appeared to be generally conceded that it was not desirable to introduce a jury in place of the Trinity Brethren into the trial of Admiralty causes; but a lively debate arose upon the question of appeal. The Bill contains a clause giving a power of appeal in interlocutory matters, and another clause disallowing any appeal except upon a question of law. The general opinion of the law lords, however, seemed to be that the latter clauses should be struck out, inasmuch as there would frequently be considerable difficulty in separating questions of law. The Lord Chancellor, therefore, expressed his intention of moving in committee that the clause in question be struck out.

We learn from a recent Jamaica paper that a Bill has been introduced into the House of Assembly for the purpose of extending the provisions of the West India Incumbered Estates Act to that important colony. The measure it is said is likely to pass without serious opposition.

On Wednesday last the Inns of Court Volunteers, at a meeting of their body in Lincoln's-inn Hall, presented their commander, Lieutenant Colonel Brewster, with a valuable piece of plate in testimony of their appreciation of his generous devotion to his work and gentlemanly conduct as their commanding officer.

THE YELVERTON CASE.

Public interest in this extraordinary case seems to have been pretty evenly divided between the evidence of the defendant and the speech of the plaintiff's counsel in reply. One of the greatest efforts of forensic eloquence, and one of the most offensive pictures of licentious conduct, commanded for the newspapers which respectively reported them an equal and almost illimitable sale. The whole series of these records may be obtained without any difficulty, except the highest flight of intellect and the basest descent of wickedness which they comprise. It seems that the aristocratic readers of the Morning Post, and the humble students of the penny papers, have confessed during the past week the power of that nature which makes the whole world kin. In the upper classes, however, Mr. Whiteside's speech and Major Yelverton's examination have been perused with equal eagerness, while the taste of lower life is thought by experienced judges to be best consulted by compressing the flow of oratory, and giving full space to the correspondence and to the description of the alleged scene on board the steamer in the Black Sea.

The advisers of Mrs. Yelverton have done well to lay the scene of the late legal drama beyond the Channel. The impressive Irish nation was peculiarly well adapted to feel and to excite sympathy with this lady's wrongs, and to declare the vindication of her character in tones which will resound throughout the world and to the end of time. Perhaps a more difficult and painful duty was never imposed upon an advocate than that of cross-examining Mrs. Yelverton, and of contending against the sympathy in her behalf, which probably possessed the adverse counsel quite as strongly as the spectators of the crowd outside the court. Upon the view of the defendant's conduct which was necessary to support a verdict in his favour, he abused the hospitality of a distinguished officer; he committed deliberate seduction; and he profaned a sacrament of the Roman Catholic Church. Further, he had written a letter which it was quite impossible to explain in any other way than as an attempt to persuade the victim of his lust to destroy the life of the child with which she was then pregnant. The most able and determined counsel might well feel overweighed with the burden which was thus imposed upon him; whereas the admitted facts on the other side were such as men at least are disposed to treat with tenderness. The most severe moralist of the male sex would scarcely say that flirtation on board steamboats leads by any necessary course of consequences to perjury. On the plaintiff's side there was, indeed, abundant room for the employment of all the skill of advocacy, but Mrs. Yelverton's character was not—like the defendant's—damaged by her own admissions beyond the possibility of effectual repair.

The questions of fact which had to be decided in this ten days' trial were really only two. The first was, whether a Scotch marriage took place in April, 1857. If that question were answered in the affirmative the case would be at an end. If it were answered in the negative, a further question would arise as to the validity of the Irish marriage in the month of July following. The fact of a marriage ceremony having taken place in Ireland was not disputed; but its efficacy depended upon the question what religion the defendant professed at the time of its celebration, and this, therefore, was the second important question in the cause. The voluminous correspondence, the conduct of the parties in England, in the Mediterranean, and in the Crimea, and even those portions of the case which have created such an insatiable demand for newspapers, were only material to the main issue in the cause in so far as they could assist the jury in determining to which side they would impute the guilt of perjury. The statute of Geo. 2, which affected the validity of the Irish ceremony, enacts that every marriage celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest between a Papist and any person who is a Protestant, or who professes himself to be such within twelve months before the marriage, shall be null and void. It may be thought that the religion of such a person as Major Yelverton—taking him according to his own description of his conduct—would be impalpable. He had attended Protestant worship with his regiment, and he had accompanied the lady who claimed to be his wife to mass. If he told the priest who read the service, as he swore he did, that he was a Protestant Catholic, we are inclined to think that, for once, he made a statement which may be accepted as an approach to truth. He was, probably, just as much, or as little, of one as of the other; and it seems rather absurd to institute an inquiry into the religion of a man who avowedly trampled on honour and morality. And yet some force must be given to the statute. If Major Yelverton is to be taken to be a Catholic because he submitted to be married by a Catholic priest, the statute becomes a dead letter. But how, it may be asked, can a man of full age and irregular life profess himself to be a Protestant? Of course, if he be an Irishman at home, he may keep the anniversary of the Boyne. But an officer serving with his regiment would be under the necessity of repressing such manifestations of religious feeling, even if he happened to be disposed to indulge in them. So long as a youth resides with his parents, he may be taken, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to be of their religion; and even after he has been emancipated, it would probably be the safest, if not the only obvious course, to follow the same rule. But the family of Major Yelverton are notoriously Protestant, because one of his ancestors sat upon the Irish Bench at a time when it was accessible only to professors of the dominant faith. The Chief Justice told the jury that "if the defendant took this woman to be his wife, and represented to her and to the priest that he was a Catholic, it would be strong evidence indeed that such was his religion." As we have not heard the thrilling tones of Mrs. Yelverton's voice, nor witnessed her fascinating deportment, we find it possible to entertain a doubt whether this direction is satisfactory. There surely cannot be any force in the first condition stated by the learned judge—"if the defendant took this woman to be his wife;" nor, indeed, does it appear to have any particular meaning, unless it be this, "if the defendant married a Catholic;" whereas, if the lady were not a Catholic, the statute would have no application to the case. The second condition—"if he represented to the priest that he was a Catholic"—may be sufficient to satisfy reasonable minds; but does it satisfy the statute? Supposing the evidence which went to prove such a representation to have been sufficient, it was quite consistent with it that Major Yelverton may have professed himself a Protestant within twelve months. Indeed, it is quite possible that the framers of this statute may have had in view the case of an ardent lover, a son of a noble Protestant house, who might be persuaded by some clever, accomplished, artful woman, of inferior birth and Romish faith, to renounce the religion of his family for the sake of a speedy union with her fascinating self. Of course, we do not say that it is expedient to enact such laws, but while such laws exist it is the duty of courts of justice to give effect to them, even after gazing upon Mrs. Yelverton and listening to Mr. Whiteside. The importance of the difficulty we have suggested is, however, very much lessened, if not got rid of altogether, by the previous finding of the jury, that there was a good Scotch marriage. It may be taken as established by sufficient evidence that the parties read together the marriage service out of a Prayer-Book, and that this proceeding, although there were no witnesses of it, constitutes by the law of Scotland a valid marriage. Still it must be owned that the dissatisfaction felt by Mrs. Yelverton with this ceremony does not seem wholly groundless; and the remark is obvious, at least to those who are not infected by the excitement of an Irish court, that two invalid marriages are not equal to a single valid one.

We think there can be no doubt where the substantial justice of this case lies, and we should learn with regret that there was any sound legal objection to the verdict which has been received with universal acclamation. Of the talents of the advocate and of the client, as displayed in Mr. Whiteside's reply, and in the letters on which he commented, it is impossible to speak in terms of exaggerated praise. We are beyond the enchantment of the lady's look and manner, but that of her style is undeniable. A woman so gifted would have been thrown away, even if she had been quietly married to Major Yelverton. How much more lamentable is the sacrifice which has been made of spirit, of talent, and of the capacity for conferring and receiving happiness through the disastrous issue of an imprudent and misplaced love! Never was there a case better adapted to excite sympathy; and seldom has an opportunity been used to better advantage than by Mr. Whiteside.

CHANCERY PRACTICE.—APPEARANCES TO AMENDED BILLS.

The practice regulating the entry of appearances to amended bills is frequently very perplexing to the practitioner, and involves, we think, unnecessary expense. We refer to the entry of appearances to amended bills by parties who have previously appeared in the cause. The requirements of the practice are correctly stated in "Braithwaite's Record and Writ Practice," p. 329; and it appears from that work that the entry of an appearance to an amended bill by such parties is required in the following cases, viz.:—

1. Where a defendant, although having appeared to and answered the original bill, is required to answer the amended bill.
2. Where a defendant who was not required to answer the original bill, and whether he has voluntarily answered such bill or not, is required to answer the amended bill.
3. Where, after a demurrer has been allowed, the plaintiff amends the bill, and requires an answer to it.
4. Where a defendant is required to answer exceptions and amendments at the same time, and the plaintiff files a new set of interrogatories for the examination of the defendant in answer to such amendments.

Such being the practice it frequently happens that a defendant is required to enter several formal appearances in the same cause, and that instead of serving one stamped copy only of an amended bill upon each solicitor in the cause—as in the case where no answer is required to the amendments—the plaintiff is required to serve a stamped copy for each defendant. We think that an appearance might, in the cases mentioned, be advantageously dispensed with, and that one formal appearance only need be required from a defendant in any cause. There are, however, other points of practice closely connected with the point in question, and which must not be overlooked.

But first we remark that the entry of a formal appearance is required chiefly to signify the defendant's submission to the jurisdiction of the Court, and that the name and address of the defendant's solicitor, or of the defendant himself, if he appear in person, may be recorded, thereby facilitating the service of notices and other proceedings in the cause. But would not these purposes be sufficiently answered by the entry of one formal appearance, and of any change of solicitor or of address which may have occurred subsequently thereto?

There were good reasons for requiring the entry of an appearance to an amended bill under the practice which obtained previously to Michaelmas Term, 1852. Under that practice the defendant's time for answering could be limited only by the entry of an appearance, and his appearance could be enforced only by service of a subpoena. But the like reasons do not now exist, because the defendant's time for answering is now computed from the date of the delivery to him or to his solicitor of a copy of the interrogatories which may have been filed for his examination.

The provisions of the practice with which the point in question is connected, and which at present lead to the requirement of the entry of more than one formal appearance by a party to a suit, are those which regulate the time for filing interrogatories, and for delivering copies thereof, for filing voluntary answers, and for demurring alone to a bill. The time upon the expiration of which a defendant, not required to answer, may obtain an order for the plaintiff to make his election in which court he will proceed, may also be included, especially if rule 7 of Order 42, of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 151, be applicable as well to amended as to original bills. By rule 2 of Order 11 of the Consolidated General Orders, p. 46, a plaintiff desiring an answer from a defendant is required to file interrogatories for that purpose within eight days after the time limited for the defendant's appearance (and such time can only be limited by serving an endorsed copy of the bill); and after that time, under rule 3 of the same Order, special leave of the Court must be applied for. By rules 4 and 5 of Order 11, p. 47, the time within which the plaintiff is required to deliver a copy of the interrogatories is regulated by the entry of an appearance by the defendant. The time within which voluntary answers to bills are to be filed is regulated by rules 5 and 7 of Order 37, pp. 120 and 121, in combination with rules 4 and 5 of Order 11 before referred to, and can only be determined, under the last-mentioned rules, by the entry of an appearance*—the time for demurring alone to a bill is, under rule 3 of Order 37, p. 120, computed from the date of the entry of an appearance,—and the time upon the expiration of which a defendant, not required to answer, may obtain an order for the plaintiff to make his election in which court he will proceed is regulated by rule 7 of Order 42, p. 151, which rule is dependent, in its construction, upon rules 4 and 5 of Order 11.

It may be observed that the foregoing provisions of the practice are applied alike to original and amended and supplemental bills; and the question is, how can our suggestion be adopted, and the harmony of the practice be preserved? Our proposal is, that a plaintiff desiring an answer from a defendant to any bill—whether an original, or amended, or supplemental, or other bill—be required to file the interrogatories within a limited time after filing or amending the bill, and, after that time, by special leave of the Court—and that he be required to deliver a copy of the interrogatories to the defendant, or to his solicitor, within a limited time after service of the bill—and that a defendant voluntarily answering, or demurring alone to a bill, or obtaining an order for the plaintiff to make his election in which court he will proceed (in cases where such order is obtainable by a defendant not required to answer), be required to file such answer or demurrer, or obtain such order, within a limited time after service of a copy of the bill. If this proposal be adopted, rules 2, 3, 4, and 5, of Order 11, rules 5 and 7 of Order 37, rule 3 of Order 37, and rule 7 of Order 42, may be abrogated; and thenceforth only one formal appearance need be entered, either by or for a defendant in any cause, and only one stamped (unendorsed) copy of an amended bill need be served upon each solicitor acting for the defendants in the cause.

With respect to suits commenced by special case, it may be remarked that the entry of appearances by the defendants (who are not under disability) being required merely to bind them to the statements agreed upon, and to signify their submission to the jurisdiction of the Court, we think that such purposes would be as adequately answered by one formal appearance as by several formal appearances. The remark is, however, almost superfluous, inasmuch as the proposed alteration with respect to suits commenced or carried on by bill, would, if adopted, operate, as a matter of course, in suits commenced by special case. For by sections 10 & 11 of the Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, it is provided that parties named as defendants to a special case, shall appear thereto "in like manner as defendants appear to bills." See also section 32 of the same Act.

The principle involved in our suggestion has, indeed, been already recognised, and the practice established—though to a limited and imperfect extent only. In Ward v. Cartwright, 10 Hare App. 73, the Vice-Chancellor Wood, after conferring with some of the other judges, decided—and the decision has hitherto regulated the practice—that an appearance need not be entered to an order to revive, or supplemental order for any defendant who has already appeared in the cause—and this, notwithstanding that the following words occur in the 52nd section of the Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, under which such orders are obtainable—"and such party or parties (the party or parties against whom the order to revive or supplemental order shall have been obtained) shall thenceforth become a party or parties to the suit, and shall be bound to enter an appearance thereto in the office of the Clerk of Records and Writs, within such time, and in like manner, as if he or they had been duly served with process to appear to a bill of revivor, or supplemental bill filed against him." The former practice always required that parties named as defendants to a bill of revivor or supplemental bill should enter appearances thereto, whether such defendants had previously appeared in the cause or not. But it seems to us that the decision, in the case referred to, is manifestly to the effect that an appearance is necessary only from persons who, by any such order, become parties to the suit—thus, as we have said, recognising the principle that only one formal appearance need be entered by or for a defendant in any cause.

EXONERATION OF MORTGAGED ESTATES.— THE ACT 17 & 18 VICT. c. 113.

The effect of the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 113 (Mr. Locke King's Act), upon mortgaged estates which have descended or been devised since the passing of the Act, is not so generally understood as it ought to be. A misconception has arisen from the use of the words "deed or document," which occur in the second proviso to the Act. The preamble of the Act shows that it was intended only to apply to cases of administration, and not to transactions inter vivos; and the changes which the enacting part of the Act introduces into the previous condition of the law are confined to a single and very simple point. Prior to the 1st of January 1855, the heir or devisee of a mortgaged estate was entitled to have the mortgage paid off out of the testator's personal estate, if such existed. The principle of this rule of law was based on the assumption that the personality of the deceased owner was the portion of his property that was enhanced by the sum borrowed; and, therefore, the law considered that the personality should be the fund primarily liable to the repayment of the loan. This assumption was, doubtless, as a general rule, warranted by the actual fact, although a mortgage was not unfrequently incurred in order to procure purchase-money for the identical estate which was bought. But whether the old rule of law was correct in its assumption of the generality of the facts upon which it was based or not, it was, at all events, very potent in defeating the most probable intentions of the mortgagor as to the distribution of his property after his death, as between his real and personal representatives.

Mr. Locke King's Act was to bring the law into harmony with the general intention of mortgagor-proprietors, without compelling them to defeat the old rule of law by express provisos in their wills, which, indeed, might be framed in ignorance of the existing law of the marshalling of assets. All legislation approaches perfection in the degree in which it reconciles law to the common understanding of men, consistently with the certainty and other essential requisites of general rules. Mr. Locke King's Act aims at the former desideratum, but fails to realize its full merit in this respect by reason of a proviso which, as appears from the numerous communications which we have published on the subject, has occasioned difficulty as to a right view of the precise scope of the Act. While the preamble, then, confines the scope of the Act to cases of administration, the enacting clause is equally simple. It merely alters the rule of law that we have stated, and declares that the heir or devisee of a mortgaged estate shall, in future, hold it charged as the primary fund for payment, instead of the personality, which can only be resorted to by the mortgagee, if the mortgaged estate prove insufficient to liquidate the amount of the mortgage. As between the heir or devisee, and the personal representative of the mortgagor, the heir or devisee can in no case claim exoneration from the latter, unless the ancestor or testator has signified an intention to that effect by "will, deed, or other document."

The Act contains two provisos, the first of which declares that the rights of the mortgagee against both the real and personal estate of the mortgagor remain untouched by the Act, which merely inverts the previous rule of marshalling, and enables the personality to be indemnified, if necessary, out of the mortgaged estate, but not converso, as was the previous rule.

The last proviso exempts from the purview of the Act the rights of any person claiming under or by virtue of any deed, will, or document made before the 1st of January 1855. This section must refer to deeds, &c., claimed under immediately, and not after a descent; for if it applied to deeds, &c., claimed under prior to the Act, it would deprive the Act of all operation whatever. The deeds &c., then referred to, are deeds, &c., made by the ancestor or testator, in which he declared his intention that the personality should be the fund primarily liable to the mortgage debt, or are deeds &c. executed under powers contained in wills. In the former class of cases the declaration that the personality of the mortgagor is to be the fund primarily liable to the mortgagee, is to be construed in connection with the subsequent will of the mortgagor, and is, therefore, pro tanto of a testamentary nature itself. Nothing can be more clear than that the Act refers only to claims under wills or to appointments under powers contained in wills, or to cases of descent. It does not apply to deeds or documents inter vivos, unless these be, as regards the purposes of the Act, of a testamentary nature.

THE MEDICAL ACT.

It appears from recent decisions that this Act requires amendment. One object of the Legislature in passing it was to prevent unduly qualified persons from holding themselves out to the public as regular practitioners in medicine and surgery. But its provisions upon this point have been found to be practically inoperative. The fortieth section enacts that "any person who shall wilfully and falsely pretend to be, or take or use the name or title of physician, surgeon, &c., or any name, title or description, implying that he is registered under this title, &c., shall, upon a summary conviction for any such offence, pay a sum not exceeding twenty pounds." And it is enacted by the 27th section, "that the absence of the name of any person from 'The Medical Register' shall be evidence until the contrary be made to appear that such person is not registered according to the provisions of this Act." Under these sections a medical practitioner in the county of Suffolk was convicted by three justices of the peace, in October, 1859, for that he wilfully and falsely pretended to be a surgeon contrary to the form of the above-mentioned Act.

Upon this conviction a case was stated for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, under the 20 & 21 Vict., c. 43, when the facts appeared to be as follows: At the hearing before the justices the Medical Register for the year in question, compiled in the terms of the Act, was produced, and it did not contain the name of the defendant. It was further proved that the defendant had his name engraved on a plate affixed to the door of his house, and that on this plate he was designated "surgeon, accoucheur, &c." Under these circumstances the justices held that he had wilfully and falsely pretended to be a surgeon within the meaning of the Medical Act; and they convicted him accordingly. When the case was argued for the appellant an objection was taken to the validity of the Medical Register which had been produced before the justices. But this was overruled; and the question at issue was finally decided by a reference to the two sections of the Act which we have given above. The Court held that these had been misinterpreted by the justices, and that the conviction must be quashed. Chief Justice Erle, in delivering judgment, said: "There is nothing in the case to show that the appellant was not in practice as a surgeon before the Act passed; there is nothing to show that he did not possess a diploma from some one of the various learned bodies who are entitled to confer it. The only facts are that he called himself a surgeon, and was not registered. I do not think that that is enough; for it cannot be maintained that every person who calls himself a surgeon without being registered is liable to be convicted."*

As the Act stands, therefore, it does not seem to afford any guarantee to the public against unduly qualified persons from holding themselves out as regular practitioners. The fact of non-registration has been held to prove nothing. Whether or not the name of a medical man is entered in the register is immaterial in so far as regards the public. But as regards the interests of the medical profession, the Act is a very important piece of legislation. By the 32nd section it is provided that no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in a court of law for medical or surgical attendance unless he shall prove at the trial that he is registered under the Act. By the 35th section all persons registered are exempted from serving upon juries, and also from serving in the militia; and by the 36th section persons registered are alone eligible for Government appointments and for a variety of other offices therein specified.

But perhaps the most important provision in the Act, so far as the medical profession is concerned, is one by means of which physicians are now enabled to maintain an action for their fees. The 31st section enacts that all persons registered under the Act without distinction shall be entitled to recover reasonable charges for professional aid, with full costs of suit, &c. But a very material condition is added, as follows:—

“Provided always, that it shall be lawful for any college of physicians to pass a by-law to the effect that no one of their fellows or members shall be entitled to sue in manner aforesaid in any court of law; and thereupon such by-law may be pleaded in bar to any action for the purposes aforesaid, commenced by any fellow or member of such college.”

This section effects an important alteration in the law; for before the passing of the Medical Act it was clearly settled that a physician, like a barrister, could not maintain an action for his fees. The principle was laid down by Lord Kenyon, in Chorley v. Bolcot (4 T. R. 318) as follows:—“It has been understood in this country that the fees of a physician are honorary, and not demandable of right; and it is much more for the credit and rank of that honourable body, and perhaps for their benefit also, that they should be so considered.”

We presume that when Lord Kenyon suggested that the rule of law was beneficial to the medical profession he meant that, as on the one hand physicians could not maintain an action for their fees, so on the other an action would not lie against them for negligence or want of skill. The Act now leaves it to the different colleges of physicians throughout the kingdom to determine whether the members of their body shall have the same privileges as surgeons, or whether they shall maintain the old rule of the profession, and regard their fees as an honorary reward for their services. We are not aware whether any of the learned bodies in question have come to any decision upon the subject. It is one, however, which materially affects the interests of the medical profession, in a purely legal point of view. For if a physician can maintain an action for his fees, it must follow, as a necessary consequence, that an action is maintainable against him for negligence or want of skill. If he assumes the privileges of a surgeon or apothecary, he must also incur their liabilities.

The English Law of Domicil.

VII. (Continued.)

OF DOMICIL OF ORIGIN.

Before concluding this chapter, I may perhaps be permitted to say a few words respecting birth of children at sea, which has given rise to considerable controversy. Vattel, in speaking of this subject says, at page 102, s. 216: “As to children born at sea, if they are born in those parts of it possessed by their nation, they are born in that country. If in the open sea, there is no reason to make a distinction between them and those who are born in that country; for, naturally, it is our extraction, not the place of our birth that gives us rights; and if children are born in a vessel belonging to that nation, they may be reputed as born in its territories, especially when they sail upon a free sea, since the State retains its jurisdiction over those vessels; and as, according to the commonly received custom, this jurisdiction is preserved over those vessels even in parts of the sea subject to a foreign dominion, all the children born in those vessels are considered as born in its territory. For the same reason, those born in a foreign vessel are reputed born in a foreign country, unless their birth take place in a port belonging to their own nation, for the port is more particularly a part of the territory, and the mother, though at the moment on board a foreign vessel, is not on that account out of the country; supposing that she and her husband had not quitted their native country to settle elsewhere.” Out of this naturally arises the question what parts of the sea can be said to belong to a country; and the law seems upon that point to be this. There can be no prescriptive right to the open sea. Treaties may affect the rights of certain countries, or there may be rights acquired by tacit agreement, but the only legal right in the sea which any country has is within cannon shot of the coast, no doubt arising out of this consideration, that it is necessary for the purpose of safety that no stranger or foreigner should be allowed to come within that distance. Vattel, s. 289, p. 128. Questions might be made, how far modern improvements in the use of cannon may vary this rule; but still, I imagine the principle would fix it to whatever range the cannon of that country were able to throw a shot. As I have incidentally touched upon the law of France with regard to legitimacy, it will not be out of place here to mention a case bearing strongly upon this point which came before Vice-Chancellor Wood.

In re Wright's Trust, 2 Kay & Johns. 595; 4 W. R. p. 541; 20 Jur. 465. The facts were as follows:—William Wright, in 1821, took the name of Browne, and went to France in 1823 to avoid his creditors; lived with a French woman, and attempted to marry her at St. Omer, but failed in consequence of not bearing his real name, but was married by the minister of the English church there in March 1824. In December of the same year a daughter was born. The marriage was admitted to be ineffectual by the laws of England and France. In 1830, William Wright was called to serve in the National Guard, and got exemption on the ground of being an Englishman. From 1830 till 1854, when he died, he lived in Paris, and never returned to England after 1823 when he left it. In 1836, having paid his creditors he resumed his own name. In August, 1841, married the same person according to the rites of the English church; and in November, 1846, at the Mairie according to the French law, when the daughter was acknowledged and legitimized. William Wright, at his death at 1854, left two daughters by a first marriage in England, and the one in France who petitioned for payment to her of half of her father's personality. The opinions of French avocats were taken, but they were conflicting; and Vice-Chancellor Wood held that the domicil of the child followed that of the father. The French law of legitimization went on the assumption of a contract at the time of conception, and that the country in which a child is born does not affect the case, it is the domicil of the parents.

I may advert to one more case, bearing upon this point, which occurred in the highest tribunal in this country; I mean the case of Rose v. Ross, 4 Wils. & Shaw, 289. The facts were these:—A Scotchman by birth, heir of entail in possession, and proprietor of estates in Scotland, early in life settled in England, making occasional visits to Scotland. By an illicit connexion with an English woman, he had a son, born in England; and afterwards went to Scotland with the child and its mother, and fifteen days after his arrival in that country he married her. They remained in Scotland two months; visited his estate, and returned to England with the child, where they remained until the death of the father. Upon the question of legitimacy, the Court of Session held, that the child was legitimate; but upon appeal to the House of Lords in this country that decision was reversed, on the ground that the domicil of the father was English (vid. p. 292 of the report where the Lord Chancellor concludes his judgment.) The case of Strathmore v. Bowes, in the appendix of the same volume, p. 89, decides in effect the same point; for there it was assumed that, where a Scotchman has a Scotch domicil, acts done by him in England, which, if done in Scotland would constitute a legal marriage, do make such marriage legal. The question there was as to the legitimacy of a child to inherit a title; and in this, of course, the law of England materially differs, because in Scotland an ante natus is legitimized for all purposes, but such legitimization is only recognised in England as to his personal status, and supposing the domicile of the parents English, not recognised at all. Now, I apprehend, that a title stands very much on the footing of real estate, for it is transmitted to a man's heirs, and a man could not be his father's heir, and therefore, entitled to real estate, unless he was legitimate for all purposes according to our law. A very singular case is reported in the "Decisions of the Court of Session," vol. 16, page 6, of M'Dowall v. Dalhousie, the facts of which were as follows:—A Scotchman, proprietor of land in Scotland, and domiciled there, formed an illicit connexion with B, a Scotchwoman, also domiciled in Scotland; she became pregnant, and in about three months thereafter he was ordered into England on military duty, and she accompanied him and was delivered of a son in October 1796. He remained for several years resident in England on military duty, but never lost his Scotch domicile, and returned there to reside in 1800; placing B. in a house at Penrith, where he maintained and frequently visited her. Several children were born of B. by A. during his residence in England, and in 1808 a formal contract was signed by A. & B. acknowledging themselves husband and wife, and he took her home to his house in Scotland where they cohabited together as husband and wife, and were universally habit and repute married persons until her death in 1834. The son born in October, 1796, raised declaration of legitimacy (as is the Scotch term) and of his right to succeed to landed estates in Scotland as heir substitute of entail. Held, first, that a valid marriage had been contracted by the parents in 1808 according to the law of Scotland. Secondly, that as the husband was a domiciled Scotchman, and the marriage was a proper Scotch marriage, it had the effect of legitimizing the son, though the place of the son's birth was England, and the principle of legitimizing per subsequens matrimonium was repudiated by the law of England; and thirdly, that it was not made out that the mother had lost her Scotch domicile, either before or after the birth of the son; but that whether she did so or not, the legitimacy of the son was equally established. To the judgment in this case a note was attached in which the following passage from Voet. lib. 25, t. 7, s. 6, was quoted; "Quia nuptia per jus finguntur retro cum concubiam contracta eo tempore quo illa prius in concubinam assumpta fecit atque ita filius quoque retro legitimus fingitur." It will be seen that in this case the difference between the English and Scotch law as to legitimizing of children is even more strongly exhibited than in the case of Don's estate recently referred to; for there the son was born in Scotland, but in this case the decision was founded upon two other propositions, in which the laws of the two countries are identical, namely, that the domicile of the son and wife follow that of the father, and further that being only resident in England for the purposes of military duty, no abandonment of his Scotch domicile had taken place, although certainly in his case the fact was rendered beyond doubt by his return and settling eventually in Scotland. There is, however, one peculiarity in the third ground of the decision, that the effect of the subsequent contract or acknowledgment of marriage was to legitimize the ante natus, even supposing her domicile were not Scotch, which, as it appears to me, assumes one or both of two things, that the domicile of the father was sufficient to make the son legitimate as being Scotch, or that the acknowledgment of the marriage had such a retrospective effect as to make the domicile of B. follow that of A. even although she was not married to him at the time of the birth of the son. The case was carried on appeal to the House of Lords, and is reported under the title of Countess Dalhousie v. M'Dowall, 7 Cl. & Fin. 817, and it was held that the child of a Scotchman, though born in England, becomes legitimate for all civil purposes in Scotland by the subsequent marriage of the parents in England if the domicile of the father was and continued then to be Scotch; and that neither the place of the marriage, nor the birth of the child, will, under such circumstances, affect the status of the child. In the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon's executors, 12 Dec. of Court of Sessions, 2 Ser. 657, Lord Fullerton makes the observation on the general subject of domicile of origin, that though there are dicta in some of the cases to the general effect that after the domicile of origin is effaced by a domicile of choice, the latter must be held to remain till a new and different domicile shall be acquired; there is certainly great difficulty in holding that where a domicile of mere choice, which is entirely dependent on the will of the party, is destroyed by a permanent and total removal, such domicile can revive or subsist to any effect whatever, whereas the domicile of origin involves an element which is independent of the mere will of the party, and may be held to subsist unless some other has been selected, and continuously preserved till the death of the party.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES OF APPEAL.)

Feb. 28.—In re Williams (a solicitor).—This was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls refusing to make an order for the discharge of Mr. Williams from custody. It appears that an order was made for the delivery up of all deeds and documents in the custody or power of Mr. Williams, belonging to Mr. Cass, his client. Mr. Williams offered to deliver those which were in his own custody, but some briefs were detained by counsel for non-payment of fees, and others were detained by another counsel for a similar reason, and were, therefore, not in the power of Mr. Williams. The Master of the Rolls was of opinion that this was no answer to the fact of disobedience to the order, and refused to order Mr. Williams's discharge.

LORD JUSTICE KNIGHT BRUCE.—This gentleman is in prison for not having obeyed an order of the court directing him to deliver up all papers and documents in his possession or power. In my opinion there is evidence before us that he has delivered all such papers and documents, and there is no evidence that he retains any of them. He must, therefore, be released, and he is, I think, entitled to the costs of the application here.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—I am entirely of the same opinion; and I desire to say nothing more upon this case than that I am of that opinion.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir W. P. WOOD.)

Bonnardet v. Taylor.—This case came before the court upon an interlocutory application by the plaintiffs, that under the common order made upon the defendants for production of documents for inspection "by the plaintiffs, their solicitors and agents," such inspection might be made by a public accountant of Liverpool, as agent employed by the plaintiffs, or some other professional accountant unconnected with the parties to the suit.

For the plaintiff it was contended that a professional accountant was an "agent" within the terms of the common order, and that it was impossible for a solicitor or his clerk, persons not versed in mercantile matters, properly to investigate these books. For the defendant it was contended, on the other hand, that the common order for inspection did not justify the plaintiffs in employing a professional accountant, who was in no sense a bona fide agent.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that although he did not recognise an accountant as coming within the term "agent" in the common order, the special circumstances of this case justified him in granting the application, and directing that the gentleman named by the plaintiffs be at liberty to inspect the books, &c., of the defendants at Newcastle.

COURT OF DIVORCE & MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

(Before the JUDGE ORDINARY.)

March 1.—Brodie v. Brodie.—The facts of this case raised an important question as to the jurisdiction of the court.

The JUDGE ORDINARY said he should probably desire to hear the case argued on both sides. It was a very grave question whether, after a husband and wife had cohabited for a long series of years in a foreign country and had there separated by mutual consent, and the husband subsequently changed his domicile to England, he should be allowed to take advantage of the process of this court to get a divorce. He understood from the public papers that the Lord Chancellor was about to move for a select committee to consider the whole subject of jurisdiction.

The case was allowed to stand over for further evidence and for argument.

HOME CIRCUIT.—CHELMSFORD.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

March 4.—The March General Sessions of the Peace for the county of Middlesex commenced this morning at Clerkenwell, before the Assistant-Judge; Mr. Payne, deputy; Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench; and a large number of magistrates.

The ASSISTANT-JUDGE, in his charge to the grand jury, adverted to the Grand Jury Bill now before the Legislature, and hoped that soon, gentlemen who were at present called upon to discharge the duties of grand jurors would be relieved of that liability, except on certain cases.

Edmund Humphrey Woolrych, Esq., has been appointed a magistrate at the Thames Police court, in the place of Mr. Yardley, who succeeds the late Mr. Secker at Marylebone.

Slingsby Bethell, Esq., has been appointed Gentleman of the Chamber to the Lord Chancellor, in the place of the Hon. W. C. Spring Rice, appointed Secretary to the Commissioners in Lunacy.

Mr. Edward W. Cox of the Western Circuit, and recorder of Falmouth, Penryn, and Helston, is a candidate for the representation of Bodmin, vacant by the retirement of the Hon. E. F. L. Gower.

Mr. Henry Potter, of Farnham, Surrey, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

THE NEW COMMISSION.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said it would be in the recollection of their lordships that last week he had brought under their consideration the appointment of the commission to inquire into the expediency of bringing together the courts of law and equity upon one site; and the means by which that object might be obtained. In their report the commissioners came to the conclusion that such concentration of the courts would be expedient; and also that it would be desirable and quite right to take some £1,400,000 for this purpose from funds of the suitors in the Court of Chancery. He had endeavoured to show to their lordships how unjust and impolitic it would be to touch those funds at all. He had understood his noble and learned friend on the woolsack to say that he also approved of what he (Lord St. Leonards) must call a misappropriation of the money of the suitors. He also thought his noble and learned friend had told the House that a Bill was prepared in order to carry out the recommendations of the commission. He (Lord St. Leonards) had heard of no such Bill, but he had heard with surprise of a new commission to be appointed for the purpose of enquiring into the office of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery. He never remembered to have heard of anything like this. Here was a great public officer, who for nearly a century and a half had administered a fund, which now amounted to nearly £49,000,000 sterling, with the utmost regularity, so that not a shilling had ever been lost to the fund; and without any charge being brought against him in either House of Parliament, without any explanation, he was to be dragged before a commissioner. There must either be some mystery, or some misconduct, or her Majesty's Government wished by this means to overhaul the fund in order to see whether they could not appropriate any part of it in furtherance of the scheme they had in view. He wished to know whether that was so or not. He knew that the present Accountant-General was indefatigable and able in the discharge of his duties. Had any complaint been made against him? If the funds belonging to the suitors were to be meddled with, the advice he should give to any man would be, either: "Get your money out of court as quickly as you possibly can;" or, "Do anything in the world rather than put your money into the Court of Chancery." The object of the commission, he suspected, was not a direct, but an indirect one—to see what was the state of the fund. Then who were the commissioners? He never was more astonished than when he saw their names. In the late commission two of the members were judges, and one of these learned persons dissented from the proposed appropriation of the fund in a paper with every word of which he (Lord St. Leonards) agreed. A similar arrangement might have led to a little confidence, but upon this commission there was not a single equity judge, nor a single equity barrister. The object was to inquire into the constitution of the Accountant-General's office, and the management of the funds of that office. He desired to abstain from saying a single word against the personal qualifications of any of the commissioners; but there were two gentlemen upon whose appointments he felt bound to make some observation. One was Mr. Rogers, a registrar of the Court of Chancery, who came forward as a very willing witness upon the last occasion. He was entirely in favour of the scheme for the concentration of the courts and of appropriating the money of the suitors for that purpose. At the late inquiry a solicitor, also of great eminence and experience, was examined. That gentleman, Mr. Field, was also on this commission. Now, Mr. Field was examined as a witness upon the former occasion. He begged their lordships' attention to what was stated by that gentleman. He said that the Accountant-General's office ought to be abolished, for, in his opinion, it was an utterly useless office; and he proposed that the clerks should all be turned over to the Bank of England, who would, thereupon, shut up their own present Chancery office and establish a new branch in Chancery-lane, or in the new consolidated building. That was the gentleman whom his noble and learned friend on the woolsack had agreed to put into this commission. Was it right, he (Lord St. Leonards) asked, that a gentleman who had so far committed himself to an opinion should be put upon a commission of inquiry? This gentleman was put into this position in consequence of what he had said on the former occasion. If this were a proper object, let it be done in a proper way. It was disrespectful to the Court, of which his noble and learned friend was the head; highly dishonourable to the Accountant-General, and alarming to the suitors, who would find out now, for the first time, that the money hitherto supposed to be under the sanction and protection of the law was liable to be appropriated to other objects than the benefit of the suitors themselves. He asserted that the suitors had always a right to demand that their funds be kept in hand. The present income of the Court of Chancery from fees amounted to £100,000 a year. With a little care an amount of £50,000 might be struck off from this charge. But his noble and learned friend, when he moved for the commission, said he did not consider it his duty to propose any reduction in the fees. Surely those fees ought to be reduced if Parliament were to allow any encroachments upon the Suitors' Fund. He thought there was great cause for alarm on the part of the suitors of the Court at the way in which the Government were dealing with these funds.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said there was not the slightest objection in acceding to the motion; but his noble and learned friend was in a state of most unnecessary alarm. There never was a better officer in the service of the Crown than the present Accountant-General. He was most honourable, intelligent, and industrious in business, and the offices over which he presided had been conducted most admirably and satisfactorily. There was no imputation against any officer of the Court whomsoever. All had conducted themselves with the utmost propriety, and in a manner consistent with their public duties. But it was imagined that, for the benefit of the suitors, there might be an improvement in the manner in which the funds were invested. As to any plan to rob the suitors of the Court of Chancery, it was preposterous. He should have thought any fear of that sort would have been quieted when, amongst the list of commissioners, was read the name of Lord Kingsdown. He thought that would be a security that the objects of the commission were legitimate, and that its labours would be efficiently discharged. Suggestions had been made that some improvement might be made in the system pursued in the Accountant-General's office. Part of the funds were invested in the Three per Cents, and part remained in cash, to every shilling of which the suitors were entitled in fixed sums. It had been supposed that there might be a means devised of putting this sum of cash out at interest upon security. Persons more experienced than he (Lord Campbell) was in financial considerations, thought that a system might be established which might ensure this benefit to the suitor. Could there be any objection to this inquiry being made? Then, again, it appeared that upon every occasion when the Accountant-General, on behalf of the suitors, bought in and sold out, a commission was paid; and though that commission was extremely small, it was felt to be a hardship upon the suitors which might be remedied for their benefit. His noble and learned friend had commented upon the names of the commissioners. He thought that the name he had mentioned would be a guarantee that the fund was safe at least. But there were other names which he (Lord Campbell) could equally well defend; though they were not so distinguished in the legal profession as that of his noble friend (Lord Kingsdown). There was Earl Grey; there was a governor of the Bank; there was Mr. Rogers, who was a most meritorious officer of the Court of Chancery; there was Mr. Anderson, who was especially versed in the financial part of the inquiry; there were two solicitors, most intelligent and most honourable men, Mr. Cookson and Mr. Field. He ventured to say no persons in the legal profession were more worthy of the confidence of the public than these gentlemen. Finally it was thought right that a member of her Majesty's Government should be placed upon the commission as a still further guarantee for the interests of the suitors, the objects of the inquiry being intended to be more for their benefit, than on any other public ground.

LORD DENMAN said he was not surprised at the jealousy felt by the noble lord (Lord St. Leonards); because one of the main results arrived at by the late report was this—that unless a certain fund, called fund (B.), could with justice be applied to the rebuilding of the courts, the whole scheme must fall to the ground. He (Lord Denman) had read the whole report with great interest. The Attorney-General seemed to be a leading personage in the proposal for consolidation; and his wish appeared to be to make the Middle Temple as useful to the Court of Chancery as Lincoln's-inn had been. Part of the plan was to pull down Temple-bar, and to build a bridge over Fleet-street. Underground tunnels were also part of the scheme, which was to take seven years for its completion, and to cost £1,400,000. Considering the inconveniences which would arise, he thought the retention of the courts at Westminster highly desirable.

LORD KINGSDOWN said he knew no more of the proposal for this commission than he gathered from the contents of a letter which had been addressed to him by a Secretary of State, asking him to serve on the commission. He had seen in a legal publication articles from which it appeared that sums to the extent of £20,000 or £30,000 might be saved to the fund by a different system of management. Whether or not that were the case he was totally ignorant, but the Government seemed to think that something might be gained; and he thought it would not be consistent with his duty to refuse to serve, when the proposal came from a Government to which he could hardly say he was an opponent. There was nothing political in the matter; and he thought there was no possibility of the most profligate and rapacious commission getting their hands into the "till," as it might be called, of the Court of Chancery. The whole and sole principle of the commission was this: to inquire whether any saving could be made by investing in any security or otherwise of the funds which have been invested on behalf of the suitors to the extent, at present, of £49,000,000. The cash standing in court amounted to a great deal more. Whatever commissioners were appointed, it was to be remembered that nothing could be done except under the authority of Parliament. Nobody could interfere with or misappropriate one shilling of the fund. He believed there was nothing in the terms of the commission which would authorise the commissioners to give any opinion upon the point whether the funds or any part of them should be appropriated to the building of new courts. He believed his noble and learned friend (Lord St. Leonards) to be most properly anxious for the safety of this fund, and that he had done more than most Chancellors who had held the great seal before him to improve its condition; but his noble and learned friend seemed to be under the impression that his speech of the other night had failed to produce the effect which perhaps it ought to have produced. He thought some secret and dangerous scheme was on foot for effecting a purpose that could not be gained directly. As far as he (Lord Kingsdown) was concerned, nothing would be more agreeable to him than that the commission should be superseded. He had seen enough to know that all who engaged in them incurred the hostility of those who were affected by the changes required, and very often of the public themselves who were the gainers by those changes. ("Hear hear," and a laugh.)

The motion was then agreed to.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this Bill,

LORD CHELMSFORD urged that it should be remitted to a select committee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR replied that sending the Bill to a select committee would involve great delay and produce no benefit.

ERRONEOUS VERDICTS.

Mr. BUTT obtained leave to bring in a Bill to make more effectual provision for the setting aside erroneous verdicts and granting new trials in criminal cases.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

A BILL TO PREVENT FRIVOLOUS OR FICTITIOUS DEFENCES TO ACTIONS FOR RECOVERY OF DEBTS.

1. The provisions of this Act shall come into operation on the tenth day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one.

2. If the plaintiff, or one of the plaintiffs if more than one, in any action which shall be commenced in any of Her Majesty's superior courts of common law at Westminster for recovery of a debt or liquidated demand in money, of the particulars of which a special endorsement may be made on the writ, pursuant to "the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852," shall, together with the precepts on which such writ shall be issued, file or deliver an affidavit in form No. 1, set forth in the schedule to this Act, or to the like effect, no defendant in such action shall be at liberty to enter an appearance, unless he shall with the memorandum of appearance deliver to the proper officer an affidavit in the form No. 2, set forth in the schedule to this Act, or to the like effect, or unless he shall obtain leave from a judge of any of the said courts to appear to such writ, on paying into court the sum endorsed on the writ, or upon an affidavit or affidavits, satisfactory to the judge, which disclose a legal or equitable defence to the action, or such facts as the judge may deem sufficient to support the application, and on such terms as to security or otherwise as to the judge may seem fit.

3. Endorsement on writ to be according to form in schedule.

4. Plaintiff may sign judgment for undisputed part of a debt.

5. In case any defendant shall before appearance obtain an order from a judge for further or better particulars of the plaintiff's demand, such defendant shall be allowed the same time for entering an appearance after delivery of such particulars which he had at the return of the summons on which such order was made, unless otherwise provided for in such order.

6. Act to be called "The Fictitious Defences Act, 1861."

EQUITY.

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT OF FUTURE CHATTELS.

Holroyd v. Marshall, 6 Jur. N. S. 931, L. C., 9 W. R., 303.

This case deserves consideration as an example of the conditions which must be observed in order that an equitable interest in chattels may be made available against a legal title. The circumstances out of which the question arose may be briefly stated thus:—One Taylor had been employed by the plaintiffs to manufacture for them damask goods, previously to his bankruptcy. The machinery of his mill having been put up for sale by the assignees, was purchased by the plaintiffs. By an indenture made between the plaintiffs of the first part, Taylor of the second part, and a trustee of the third part, after reciting that Taylor was tenant of a mill and other buildings, and that the machinery specified in the schedule thereto was placed on the premises and belonged to the plaintiffs, and that Taylor had agreed for the purchase thereof for £5,000, but, being unable to pay the purchase-money, it had been agreed that the same should be secured, it was witnessed that the plaintiffs assigned to the trustee all the machinery, &c., upon trust for Taylor until demand of payment, and if he should pay the £5,000 for Taylor absolutely; but in case of default in payment, upon trust to sell and apply the proceeds in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim. The deed contained a proviso that all machinery which, during the continuance of the security, should be placed on the premises in addition to, or substitution for, the machinery specified in the schedule, should be subject to the trusts thereby declared; and that Taylor would do all acts for assuring such added or substituted machinery accordingly. This deed was registered as a bill of sale. The plaintiffs becoming dissatisfied with Taylor's conduct, demanded payment, and on default took, or attempted to take, possession of the machinery. It was alleged by the principal defendant, who was an execution creditor of Taylor, that at the time of this attempt the sheriff was already in possession under a f. fa. issued by himself. The plaintiffs, however, assumed to act as if they had effectually taken possession of the machinery, and proceeded to a sale by auction. Their right to the machinery on the premises at the date of the deed was not disputed; but during the sale the sheriff took forcible possession of the machinery which had been added and substituted by Taylor, and carried it away. The bill was filed against the sheriff and the execution creditor, to restrain proceedings under the f. fa.; and the question was as to the plaintiffs' right to this added and substituted machinery.

The attempt to prove that the plaintiffs took possession before the sheriff failed. But Vice-Chancellor Stuart decided in the plaintiffs' favour, upon the ground that Taylor had been in possession as their agent from the date of the deed. He admitted that an assignment of chattels to be subsequently acquired is void at law, unless some act be done to give effect to it after the chattels have come into the possession of the assignor. It has been said that such an assignment may operate as a license to seize the after-acquired goods; and if the assignee does seize them under such implied licence, he will be justified in so doing, and his title will thereby become complete. The law upon this subject is founded on Lord Bacon's maxim, Licet dispositio de interesse futuro sit inutilis, tamen fieri potest declaratio precedens qua sortitur effectum, interveniente novo actu. In the present case there was declaratio precedens—viz., the proviso in the deed that added or substituted machinery should be subject to the trusts thereof, but where was the novus actus necessary to give effect to it? The Vice-Chancellor found it in the possession of Taylor as the plaintiffs' agent, that is to say, in the continuance without any change of the state of things created by the deed, except so far as a change was operated by bringing on the premises fresh machinery as Taylor purchased it. He said, "It is not disputed that as to all the machinery in the mill existing at the date of the security, Taylor the assignor was properly in possession at the time of the seizure, that he was in possession as agent of the plaintiffs. During that possession he purchased the additional articles in question. They were placed in the mill, and made an integral part of the machinery used for the working of the mill. They are in his possession as agent of the plaintiffs, and what more is required?" The defendant had contended that the deed could not operate to pass machinery acquired subsequently to its date, unless it were re-registered under the Bills of Sale Act. The Vice-Chancellor answered this argument by observing that the language of the deed clearly showed an intention that after-acquired property should be subject to its operation; and, therefore, he held that the requirement of the Act was sufficiently complied with by the original registration. In support of this view he relied on the concluding words of the schedule, "And all other the machinery, &c., in or about the premises." But even if it were possible to give to these words the proposed construction, the observation occurs that the object of the clause in the deed to which the Vice-Chancellor referred, was to assign chattels belonging to the plaintiffs to a trustee, upon trusts to permit Taylor under certain conditions to hold possession thereof; and, therefore, that clause could not by any possibility operate as a bill of sale from Taylor to the plaintiffs either of existing or of after-acquired property. Both the argument and the judgment upon this point appear to have proceeded upon a confusion between the former part of the deed, by which the plaintiffs assigned existing machinery to the trustee, and the

On appeal to the Lord Chancellor this decision was reversed, and the law applicable to the case was distinctly stated. If possession had been taken by an agent of the plaintiffs before the sheriff entered, the decree appealed from would have been right. But the possession relied upon by the Vice-Chancellor seemed wholly insufficient, "for it was the possession of Taylor the assignor, who cannot be considered the agent of the assignees for this purpose." An attempt was made to support the decree by contending that, irrespective of whether possession had or had not been taken by the plaintiffs, they, under their equitable title, must be preferred to the judgment creditor. But in Mogg v. Baker (3 M. & W. 193), Mr. Baron Parke said he had the highest authority for stating that the opposite doctrine prevailed in equity as well as at law, and this statement was adopted by the Lord Chancellor in the present case.

The limits within which courts of equity will give effect to these assignments will, however, be better understood by reference to the case of Langton v. Horton (1 Hare 549). In that case there had been an assignment by way of mortgage of a whale ship, then upon her voyage, and of all oil, head-matter, and other cargo, which might be caught or brought home in the ship. The assignment, therefore, purported to comprise the produce of fish then swimming in the sea, and a clearer case of dealing with chattels having only a possible future existence could not be conceived. Sir James Wigram laid down distinctly that non-existing property may be the subject of valid equitable assignment. But he added that, in the case before him, the mortgagee, having a good foundation for his title, had completed it by obtaining actual possession before the appearance of a rival claimant. When the ship arrived in port, he produced the assignment to the captain, who, in the absence of the owner, took upon himself to deliver possession to the mortgagee. The sheriff's officer, who came on a subsequent day to seize the cargo, found the mortgagee already in possession of it; and this is the important difference between this case and the recent one which has suggested these remarks. The only point on which it can be thought that Langton v. Horton goes beyond the decisions at common law is, that possession was yielded to the mortgagee by the captain of the ship, whom the Court did not consider as having authority from the owner for that purpose. It may be doubted whether this was a sufficient novus actus to satisfy Lord Bacon's rule, which appears to require some act to be done by the mortgagor. But it has been held even at law that if there be a power given by the deed to take possession of after-acquired property, and if the mortgagee act upon that power by taking possession, even without the consent of the mortgagor, his title thus becomes complete. Then, did the deed of assignment in Langton v. Horton contain an express power to take possession, or might such power be implied from the very fact of the assignment? If either of these questions were to be answered in the affirmative, Sir James Wigram's decision would be strictly in accordance with the current of authority at common law.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

SEVERANCE OF DEMESNE LANDS OF A MANOR.

In re the London and South-Western Railway (Exeter Extension) Act, 1856; Ex parte Lord Henley & another, M. R., 9 W. R. 350.

The point which has been ruled in this case is thus introduced to the reader by Mr. Serjeant Scriven, in the Treatise on Copyholds:—"When demesne lands are separated from a manor, so that the custom is destroyed, they are no longer demisable by copy, and can never re-unite; as if lands are forfeited, or escheat, or otherwise come to the hands of the lord of the manor, and he make a lease for life, or for years, or for one year, or half a year, or other certain time, by deed, or even by parol." . . . "By a separation of the demesne the author conceives is meant a separation produced by the act of the person having the fee simple of the manor; though in Lee v. Boothby, Cro. Car. 521, it is said that a lord pro tempore leasing a copyhold is a severance; but the dictum in that case is in complete opposition to several authorities, which have established that a lease by the lord, being tenant in tail, or for life or years only, will not destroy the custom as to the reversioner or remainder-man." 1 Scriv. Cop. 14, 15. The decision before us is only another instance in which the dictum in Lee v. Boothby has been judicially disapproved.

The lord farmer of a manor, holding under the Bishop of Salisbury, the lessor of the manor, by a lease for a term of 21 years, during the continuance of the term, leased the lands by parol to a tenant from year to year. According to the custom of the manor, the lands were grantable by the lessee for one life in possession and three in reversion. The lord farmer, being afterwards desirous of mortgaging his interest, surrendered the lease of the manor, obtained a new lease for 21 years from the bishop, and by an indenture dated the following day assigned the new lease to a mortgagee for the residue of the term, as a security. The question then arose, what were the respective rights of the lessor and lessee in the manor. The lord farmer asserted, and the reversioner denied, that the former still had, notwithstanding and after his grant by parol of the demesne lands, a right to re-grant the same according to the custom of the manor. In order to try the right, the lessee proceeded to exercise his alleged power. He held a court, granted the lands, and a tenant was admitted, whose interest was purchased by a railway company, and the money paid into court. It was now claimed by the lord farmer and his customary tenant. The Bishop resisted the claim on the ground that the grant by the lord farmer was bad, the lands having lost their demisable quality, at least during the subsistence of the lease, and that the money belonged to him as lessor.

The Master of the Rolls considered it to be beyond doubt that if the lands had been granted by the owner in fee of the manor in the way mentioned, the demisable quality of the lands would have been destroyed. But he also held, in opposition to the dictum in Lee v. Boothby, that a separation of demesne lands by a lord with a limited interest could not bind the right of the remainder-man or reversioner. It followed that the new lease granted by the Bishop of Salisbury conferred on the lessee exactly the same powers as it would have done if it had been granted to him for the first time or to a stranger. All defects, therefore, and severances, arising from the previous acts of the lord farmer, were cured by that new lease; and his right to grant the lands, according to the custom, by copy of court roll, was restored to him.

It then appeared that since the granting of the new lease the lord farmer had continued to let the lands by parol to holders from year to year, at a rack rent; and it was argued that these acts, occurring since the grant of a new lease, though they might not create a permanent severance of the demesne lands, must have the effect of causing a severance during the continuance of the lease. The Court held that, inasmuch as the legal estate was no longer in the lessee, but in his mortgagee, these acts of parol demise by the lord farmer could not be valid as against the mortgagee. The agreement with these tenants was that of a stranger; they were liable to be ejected at any moment by the mortgagee; they were, in fact, tenants at will, and it is established law, that if the lord of a manor let the demesne at will, no severance of the demesne lands will be effected.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF ARREST—DETAINEES—CONFLICT OF OPINION BETWEEN THE COURT OF CHANCERY AND THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Ochford v. Freston, 9 W. R. Exch. 315; Chapman v. Same, ib.; Bateman v. Same, ib. Q. B. 311; Ex parte Same, ib. Chanc. 321.

By the 257th section of the Bankrupt Consolidation Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106), it is, among other things, in effect provided that the Court, on the application of the assignees or of any creditor of a bankrupt whose certificate has been refused or suspended, or to whom any further protection has been refused, shall grant a certificate to that effect operating as a common law judgment; on which the body of the bankrupt may be taken and detained in execution. Upon the proper construction of this provision (taken in connection with s. 112), an important question has been discussed in the Court of Chancery, and also in the Courts of Exchequer and Queen's Bench; and as these tribunals disagree, it will be well to explain shortly the precise point at issue between them.

The 112th section above referred to protects a bankrupt not in prison at the date of his adjudication from imprisonment until the expiration allowed him for finishing his examination, and for such time afterwards as shall be from time to time enforced by the court on the bankrupt summons until the allowance of his certificate; and, inasmuch as in the first of the above three cases, the commissioner had given the certificate under s. 257 (upon which an execution writ of ca. sa. issued), before the time allowed for the bankrupt to finish his examination had expired, the Barons of the Exchequer were unanimously of opinion that on such writ of execution the bankrupt was entitled to his discharge—because the certificate had been given by the commissioner prematurely. And so far as this point was concerned, it may be here remarked that the Queen's Bench appear to be of the same mind as the Exchequer, though in the particular application before the former court, it was not necessary to decide the question. But it so happened that after the expiration of the period for finishing his examination, and at a time, therefore, when the commissioner could legally give the certificate referred to in section 257, two other creditors applied for and obtained certificates in respect of their respective claims; and under each of these the bankrupt, already in custody under the first ca. sa. (which it will be remembered issued upon the certificate prematurely given) was detained. In the first of these subsequent cases, the process of execution issued out of the Court of Exchequer, and in the other out of the Queen's Bench; and, in each case, the defendant (or bankrupt) applied for his discharge, though with different results. The Court of Exchequer held (Martin, B., however, dubitante) that he was entitled to his discharge, by reason of the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Hooper v. Lane (6 Ho. of Lds. Cases, 443). They considered that case to establish this principle, viz. that if a man be illegally in custody at the time when a detainer is supposed to operate upon him, he shall be free from the custody under the detainer; in other words, if he is only illegally in custody, he must be set at large before he can be legally arrested. And they did not think that this principle ought to be qualified by making the liability to be detained upon the primary illegal arrest, depend upon the further question whether the sheriff was or was not liable to proceedings for taking, under such previous writ, the person detained. It was urged upon the court that their discharging the bankrupt upon the ground that his original arrest was illegal—the certificate under sect. 257 having been given prematurely—would throw discredit upon a part of bankruptcy practice as now usually administered, viz., upon the “protection” usually endorsed on the bankrupt summons—for, if the bankrupt could not legally be arrested during his examination time, no such protection was needed. But the Court of Exchequer did not feel themselves pressed with this argument, because the most that it tended to show was that such endorsement was surplusage, and in practice—as preventing illegal arrests—it was convenient. As to this part of the case it was not referred to in the application to the Court of Queen's Bench for a discharge from the process which had issued out of that court; but upon the main question they differed altogether from the Court of Exchequer, and refused to order the person to be discharged. They mainly relied upon the law as established in Barrett v. Price (9 Bing. 566); which they held not to be affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Hooper v. Lane; because in the case last mentioned, the sheriff himself was a wrongdoer in making the primary arrest, which in the case of Freston he was not—being justified by the writ, however invalid the certificate of the commissioner on which that writ issued may have been. And in accordance, therefore, with Barrett v. Price, the Queen's Bench conceive the law as to detainer to be that it is valid if an original arrest by the detaining party would have been valid,—unless, indeed, the primary arrest was wrongful on the part of the sheriff; or, unless there was collusion between the arresting and the detaining creditor, or between the arresting creditor and the sheriff.

The Court of Queen's Bench, therefore, having on these grounds refused to interfere, and to make a rule for setting aside the detainer (which was the mode in which the application for a discharge shaped itself in that court), the bankrupt then resorted to the Court of Chancery, availing himself of his writ of habeas corpus, which issues out of all the superior courts, both at law and equity. In disposing of this writ the Court of Chancery sat, therefore, in effect as a court of appeal from the courts of law; and they have reversed the judgment of the Queen's Bench, adhering to the opinion (and very much upon the same ground) of the Barons of the Exchequer. Assuming that the arrest in the first of the above cases was illegal, as having been upon a premature certificate, the Court came “to the question on which the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer have deliberately differed”—viz., whether, on such illegal arrest, it was possible for the bankrupt to be legally detained? and they answered that question in the negative. They held that during the time of privilege, no foundation for a subsequent seizure could be laid; and though the case depended rather upon this general principle (which, it was remarked, had been consistently observed by Lord Eldon) rather than on Barrett v. Price, or Hooper v. Lane; neither of which authorities really applied to the present case. Eggington's case (2 Ell. & Bl. 717) appeared to the Court of Chancery more closely in point. There it was held by the Queen's Bench (Lord Campbell presiding) that a man in custody under an illegal arrest issued at the suit of A., might be detained under a ca. sa. issued without collusion at the suit of B. But in the present case the Lord Chancellor distinguished his previous decision, by explaining that in Eggington's case the original arrest was illegal, not because it invaded a personal privilege, but because it had been made on a Sunday; which he considered made the whole difference. The bankrupt was accordingly discharged from custody.

LAW EXAMINATIONS.

I cannot help thinking that the proposed examinations may be advantageously carried, at least a step farther than is at present proposed; and that some sort of bridge may be thrown across the gulf which must otherwise separate the one class of clerks (viz., those whose articles happen to bear a date prior to 28 August, 1860) from the other. The course which most obviously suggests itself (and was, I believe, successfully carried out in the Civil Service) is this.—Let every member of the class I have first named have the option of submitting himself to either or both the examinations, and obtain (if he can) a certificate of his success. Depend upon it, the certificate will be none the less valued, either by its possessor or the public, from the fact that it was sought and won, not by compulsion, but by choice.

Indeed, Sir, it seems to me that however unfair it may be on the part of the committee to attempt to make these examinations compulsory in the class I have named, it is far more unfair to exclude from them altogether those who voluntarily offer to undergo the test. Some persons, I know, sneer and pooh-pooh the examination movement; but we can no more check the advancing waves by sneering and pooh-poohism than hope by such means to stay the progress of a great movement daily advancing in importance and popularity. We cannot afford to make light of it, if we would. The old, short, easy, royal roads to success are well nigh blocked up; the old weapons of wealth, patronage, and the like, to which every foe was expected to succumb, are fast losing their power. We live in a practical, matter of fact age, where other weapons are required, where it is insisted that the square men, and the square men only, shall fill the square holes, where, in other words, credit is given only for what is indisputably proved, and every man must establish his right to occupy the position he seeks. Every manly heart rejoices that it is so, and therefore, Sir, I would earnestly appeal to the committee, through your columns, not to shut out from the proposed examinations a single clerk who has the desire to add alike to his own honour, and that of the profession to which he aspires.

A CLERK ARTICLED PRIOR TO 28th AUG. 1860.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

I observe in your article in last Saturday's number that you give credit to the existence of a “rumour” that a considerable number of “ten years' clerks” have rushed into articles to avoid a preliminary examination. I have no knowledge whether or not such an insinuation has been set afloat, but I would suggest that if a considerable number of clerks who were deserving, in the eye of the Legislature, of the privilege granted to them have, since the passing of the Act, availed themselves of their opportunities of obtaining their articles, it only proves their appreciation of the benefit conferred by the Act.

But, even admitting the rumour to be correct, before passing what appears to me to be a slur upon the ten years' clerks for endeavouring to shrink from an examination such as the preliminary one suggested by the committee, I would ask you to consider who the ten years' clerks are. The greater proportion of them will be found to be men whose time is fully occupied by their duties; they are practical men of business, and many of them good lawyers and could easily pass an examination on points of their profession, but in my opinion it would be hardly fair to place them on a footing with youths just leaving school, in what might be properly termed a school examination. How many solicitors there are who now occupy the most eminent and honourable positions who would find it difficult to pass a creditable examination either on the last four subjects of the first part of the preliminary examination, or in any two subjects of the second part? At sixteen years of age they could have done so, no doubt; but their time having been for years past devoted to the work of their profession where the subjects referred to but seldom come before them, the majority of them would be found wanting. 'The ten years' clerks are many of them similarly circumstanced. Probably some of them could have passed the examination years back; but to train again and read up for such an examination would be to them so much time wasted and useless labour. To come within the 4th section of the Act they must have been efficient for the profession for ten years. However, as I read the recommendation of the committee the preliminary examination is only intended for those who have not by other means proved their fitness; and, in my humble opinion, this is carrying into effect the intention of the framers of the Act—the object of the preliminary examination being simply to ascertain whether the applicant is fit and competent to enter the profession. THE COUNTRY SOLICITORS' UNION.

Can any of your readers tell me what has become of this gigantic scheme to do away with the London agents, once the subject of an admirable article in your columns? If I mistake not, the office was on a first floor in Warwick-court in the same room and employing the same secretary as the Royal Commission as to Evidence in Chancery. I recollect wishing at the time that the Lord Chancellor, Lords Lyndhurst, Brougham, &c. &c. &c., were aware of the alliance.

THE EQUITY JUDGES.

At the commencement of the present sittings after Term the V. C. Stuart had 83 causes for hearing in his paper. Several of them, of course, were not ripe for hearing; but that in which a poor friend of mine is greatly interested was so and had been from the 11th January; and since that day to the present time many weary weeks have passed over, and the cause is not yet heard. My poor friend complains that as the Master of the Rolls had applied to the Vice-Chancellor for a transfer of some of the business before him, that learned judge might have spared some of it, and thus have enabled the Master of the Rolls to have put my poor friend out of his misery. A MANAGING CLERK.

NEW BANKRUPTCY BILL AND REGISTRARSHIPS.

I hope the Incorporated Law Society or the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, will, ere it be too late, take care that provision is made in the present Bill that future vacancies in the registrarships of the London and County Courts shall be filled by barristers or solicitors only:—as the barristers have the monopoly of the commissionerships, perhaps the solicitors ought to have that of the registrarships, especially as a very important part of a country registrar's duty is that of taxing bills of costs, of which, generally, barristers know little or nothing practically.

By the 5 & 6 Vic. c. 122, under which the district bankruptcy courts and consequent registrarships were created, no provision is made for the qualification of the registrars, and the consequence is that this most important office, which ought to be filled by a first-rate lawyer (for the registrar, when sitting as deputy for the commissioner, can do every thing the commissioner himself can, except commit, grant bankrupts' certificates, and hear disputed adjudications), may be and was in a country district with which I am acquainted, filled by a layman not possessing the slightest knowledge beforehand of his duties, or having had an hour's legal education. Even county court registrarships, which are of a much inferior character, require to be filled by practising solicitors, and I therefore hope one of the bodies above named will do their fraternity the justice of endeavouring to secure the insertion of a clause in the new Bill to remedy the matter I have pointed out.

I would suggest that only practising solicitors of ten years standing should be eligible for the office.

A Manual of Equity Jurisprudence, founded on the Works of Story and Spence, and comprising in a small compass the points of Equity usually occurring in Chancery and Conveyancing, and in the General Practice of a Solicitor. By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L. 6th Edition. Stevens and Sons. 1861.

This little work has now reached a sixth edition, and although it has from time to time received considerable additions in the shape of new cases, it is still remarkable for its moderate dimensions and the simplicity of its arrangements. It is yet the only book which can fairly pretend to be a manual of equity jurisprudence. Originally it was little more than an attempt to condense the larger works on the same subject of Mr. Justice Story and of Mr. Spence. But since its first edition Mr. Smith has judiciously noted up a number of recent authorities relating to the points explained in the original work. Although this proceeding appears to be, and is, in fact, somewhat opposed to the proper scheme of the work, students will nevertheless find it very convenient to be directed, by so learned and competent a teacher, to the latest cases affecting any particular doctrine of the Court. The difficulty is, not to mislead a young reader in stating a long-established doctrine in broad general terms, and then tacking on to such statement one or two recent modifications or extensions of it, but omitting altogether a very numerous class of cases, having as much relevancy to the doctrine as those which are cited—their citation depending merely upon the accident of their recent decision. It is, of course, impossible, in a very small elementary work, to do more in effect and with precision than to disclose the proper elements of the subject under consideration; and any attempt to deal with specific details can hardly be satisfactory in such a book. Thus the law of equitable liens is disposed of by Mr. Smith in a page and a half—certainly the smallest possible compass in which the first principles of the doctrine could be stated even in the most general terms; but in truth, Mr. Smith does not affect to aim at any generalization under this head. He is content with stating one proposition from Story as to the usual way of enforcing a lien in equity, and four others from Spence as to the liens of a solicitor, of joint tenants, of trustees and of annuitants; and as to the lien of a solicitor he cites four recent cases, and states the effect of a decision in one. We have taken the section upon equitable liens, because it affords us an opportunity of giving an easy example of one objection to which all books such as this manual are exposed. The true notion of a legal manual of doctrine appears to us to be a book in which principles only are stated, cases being cited merely for the purpose of illustration. It is impossible otherwise to attain even the semblance of completeness within so small an area. It is not enough that the division and enumeration of topics should be accurate; if under many of the heads nothing more is stated than the special ruling in a few isolated cases, which have no more right to be singled out for that honour than scores or hundreds of others which might properly be included under the same head. But although Mr. Smith appears not to have been very anxious about the scientific completeness of his book, he has evidently bestowed considerable pains in making it of practical use. Any diligent student who traces out for himself the sources of information indicated in this little manual need never to be at a loss for information as to the doctrines of courts of equity; and we know of no work which is so well suited for a young beginner in the study of equitable jurisprudence. The fact that it has gone through five editions shows how well it has been appreciated; and we can confidently say that the sixth edition is far the best which has yet appeared.

The Indian Penal Code (Act XLV. of 1860), with notes. By W. MORGAN, and A. G. MACPHERSON, Esq., Barristers-at-Law. G. C. Hay, & Co.: Calcutta. 1861.

It is now many years since the notion of codifying Indian law was first conceived. There have of course been numerous reports and blue books on the subject. It is more than twenty years since the Indian Law Commissioners, of whom the late Lord Macaulay was president, laid before the Governor-General the draft of an Indian penal code. It was not, however, until last year that the recommendations made in 1837 were carried into effect. The penal code, which was very much, if not altogether, the work of Mr. Macaulay, was then enacted with few alterations by the Legislative Council; and the volume now before us is a very admirable edition of the Act as passed by the Council. Mr. Walter Morgan, one of the authors of this edition, is the Master in Equity of the Supreme Court of Calcutta, and was formerly clerk to the Legislative Council. It is not many years since he practised at the English bar, where he was regarded by his brethren as an accomplished and promising lawyer. We are, therefore, not surprised to find that he has proved quite a model editor of a code. The enactments, as well as the editors' notes, are incorporated in the text, but in different types, and in an extremely convenient manner. The notes exhibit considerable learning and aptitude for such work as the editors have undertaken. Indeed, we hardly know any English Act of Parliament which has been so well and skilfully edited. Messrs. Morgan and Macpherson not merely explain the text of the enactments by a judicious commentary, but they supply abundant and useful illustration of the probable operation of particular enactments; and altogether they have done their work in a manner not less creditable to the bar of Calcutta than it is to themselves.

The Act itself is highly interesting to English lawyers at the present time, now that they are at length making a serious attempt at something like an English Criminal Code. But we must postpone for the present any minute examination of this great work, comprising, as it does, so large a department of jurisprudence. We may observe, however, for the purpose of shewing the advanced character of the Indian code, that it makes certain breaches of trust criminal, and renders the party guilty liable to severe punishment. Dishonest "misappropriation" of property is also made a punishable crime, and so is the dishonest removal or concealment of property; and the dishonest execution of a deed of transfer, containing a false statement of consideration. A new technical term of crime, and one of extensive application in this code, is "mischief;" and we cannot omit noticing at the present moment—now that the Lord Chancellor has a Bill before the House of Lords to make the forging of a trade mark a misdemeanour—that there are very careful provisions on the same subject in the Indian Penal Code. We are glad to see that the illogical and absurd distinctions indicated by our English terms felony and misdemeanour, and the words themselves, are nowhere to be found in the penal code of India.

Obituary.

THE LATE SIR JOHN OWEN, BART., M.P.

It is not perhaps generally known, that this venerable baronet (who sat in Parliament uninterruptedly for the unusually lengthened period of 55 years) was the only surviving member of the bar who held briefs as junior counsel with the celebrated Lord Erskine when in the zenith of his professional fame.

Sir John was born in 1776, and was the eldest son of Joseph Lord, Esq., by Corbetta, daughter of Lieutenant-General Owen, and granddaughter of Sir Arthur Owen, Bart. His father not being a man of very ample means, and Sir John having early exhibited considerable talent, it was determined that he should seek his fortune in professional life at the bar; and he was accordingly sent to Oxford, where he graduated B.A., at Christ Church, and in 1800 was called to the bar at the Inner Temple. He immediately took chambers at No. 26, Arundel-street, in the Strand, and attended the Gloucester and the Carmarthen Sessions, and also rode the Oxford Circuit. His practice soon increased, and in 1802 he removed to chambers No. 10, New-square, Lincoln's-inn, (and in 1809, to No. 3), and became much engaged as junior counsel at the Nisi Prius sittings of the common law courts both at Westminster and at Guildhall. On one occasion he was retained in an important cause as junior counsel for the plaintiff with Mr. (afterwards Lord) Erskine; and when it became the duty of that eminent advocate to reply, it was found that he was then addressing a jury elsewhere; and the judge called on Mr. Lord to proceed, refusing to delay the cause until Mr. Erskine could be present. Mr. Lord readily availed himself (like the "silver-tongued" Mr. Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield, on a similar occasion) of this most opportune circumstance, and addressed the jury with so much eloquence and power that he not only obtained a verdict, but Mr. Erskine, who had entered the court during his speech, turned round and congratulated him, saying at the same time "If you persevere in this course Mr. Lord, you will not only be 'Lord,' by name, but in due time 'Lord' by title."

Sir John in after life mentioned this fact with much gratification to the writer of this brief sketch; but his career at the bar was suddenly stayed by the death of Sir Hugh Owen, sixth baronet, to whose large estates and property he succeeded by devise. He then assumed the name and arms of Owen, and, the title being extinct, was himself in 1813 created a baronet. He often, however, mentioned how much more brilliant would have been his career, in all human probability, had he remained at the bar. In 1806, he entered Parliament as member for Pembrokeshire, and continued uninterruptedly to represent that county until 1841, when age and increasing infirmities induced him to desire a smaller constituency, and he was elected for Pembroke, which borough until his death he represented without intermission. With the single exception of another venerable Baronet (Sir Charles Burrell, who entered Parliament the same year, but rather earlier in the year), he was the oldest member of the House of Commons.

In 1802, he married Charlotte, daughter of Rev. J. L. Philips (who was the mother of the present baronet), and after her death in 1829, he married in 1830 as his second wife Frances, third daughter of E. Stephenson, Esq., of Farley Hill, Berks, who survives him. Sir John was governor of Milford Haven, and Lord Lieutenant of Pembrokeshire, and he was also patron of six livings. He died on 15th ult. at his seat, Taynton House, Newent, Gloucestershire, in his 86th year, and is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son, now Sir Hugh Owen, Bart., born in 1803, who married in 1825 Angelina Cecilia daughter of Sir C. G. Morgan, Bart., deceased, and who after having been recently defeated in a contested election for the county has now succeeded his father as member for Pembroke borough.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

At a recent meeting of this society, Mr. EDGAR read a paper "On some Proposed Amendments in the Law relating to Procedure and Evidence on Criminal Trials."

During the last session several measures relating to procedure and evidence on criminal trials were brought before Parliament, which this Society was unable to consider from its attention being occupied with other questions. None of the measures to which I allude received the sanction of the Legislature; but as they are all of a more or less important character, and are likely to be introduced again in the next session of Parliament, I have thought it advisable to bring them to the notice of the Society on the present occasion.

The Bills to which I refer are—Lord Chelmsford's "Indictable Offences" (Metropolitan District) Bill," Lord Brougham's "Plea on Indictments Bill," Mr. Denman's "Felony and Misdemeanour Bill," and Lord Brougham's "Law of Evidence Further Amendment Bill."

In addition to these Bills there are some other amendments in the law relating to procedure and evidence on criminal trials, which have been suggested during the last few years, to which I am anxious to call the attention of the Society. Of course, it will be impossible for us to discuss on this evening all the questions which arise on the Bills and schemes to which I refer; but on some of them an opinion may be now expressed, whilst others may be considered at a future meeting or referred to a committee. At all events, it is right that an opportunity should be afforded to this Society of pronouncing an opinion, if deemed advisable, on measures involving considerable changes in our criminal procedure.

The Bill of Lord Chelmsford provided that charges were not to be tried at the Central Criminal Court, or at any quarter session in the city of London or the metropolitan police district, without previous investigation by a magistrate; and that after a person had been committed to take his trial by a metropolitan police magistrate, or the Lord Mayor, or an alderman of the city of London, sitting at the Mansion House or the Guildhall, or by any two justices of the peace sitting publicly in any part of the metropolitan district, except in the divisions assigned to police courts, an information, to have the effect of the finding of a grand jury, should be filed in lieu of an indictment. The Bill also provided that where the magistrate dismissed the charge, the prosecutor might prefer an indictment; and there was a proviso that nothing therein contained should apply to any charge of treason, or any offence against the State, or to any charge of nuisance. These are the principal provisions of the Bill which it is necessary to mention at present, and, in my apprehension, they involve a change of a most judicious and beneficial character. It is impossible to maintain any institution at the present day which is entirely useless; but the effect of the evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1849 was, that grand juries in the metropolis are not only unnecessary, but in many cases positively mischievous. As Lord Chelmsford very justly said in moving the second reading of the Bill last session—"If the grand jury found a true bill, they merely repeated the decision of the magistrate who sent the prisoner for trial; and if they threw out the bill, they might be committing a grave error in the administration of justice. That was the view which the late Lord Denman took, and on which he contended that the institution was superfluous. It was not to be wondered at that it frequently happened that bills sent before grand juries at the Central Criminal Court were ignored, to the surprise of the judges who had the depositions before them, of the magistrates who committed the prisoner for trial, of the prosecutors who knew the facts, and even of the prisoners themselves. The grand jury, in fact, had been called the hope of the London thief."

The great object of a grand jury is to afford a security that no man shall be put on his trial for any charge unless there be a prima facie case against him, amounting to something more than a bare suspicion; and there can be no reason in the nature of things why, after the accused has been committed for trial by a police magistrate, after a careful and public investigation of the charge in the presence of the accused, with full opportunity to him to avail himself of professional assistance, an ex parte inquiry should take place before a secret tribunal, in the absence of the prisoner, and of any one to represent him. With regard to offences of a political character, where, for obvious reasons, a grand jury is a great safeguard, these were excluded from the operation of the Bill; and none of the arguments which have been brought forward against the present system apply to such cases. Again, whatever advantages may arise from country gentlemen taking a part as grand jurors in the administration of public justice, this consideration, it is obvious, can have no application to the metropolitan district, where, amongst the members of the mercantile community, the frequent attendance required of them as jurors operates as a most serious inconvenience. Looking to the state of feeling on this subject throughout the metropolitan district, I have no doubt that the passing of Lord Chelmsford's Bill would be considered as a great boon and as a triumph of common sense over common law.

The "Plea on Indictments Bill," brought in by Lord Brougham, provided, that when a person was arraigned upon an indictment, he should not be asked whether he was guilty or not guilty, but whether he desired to be tried, or plead guilty; and that in case he answered that he desired to be tried, this answer should have the same effect as a plea of not guilty. With regard to this proposed amendment in our criminal procedure, it may be very true that in the great majority of cases no difficulty is felt by prisoners, and that the plea of not guilty has only reference to the legal proof of the charge; still instances frequently arise where prisoners believe that they are required to utter a falsehood as the condition of having a fair trial according to law, and are thereby induced to plead guilty. There are few cases, indeed, of a serious character in which such a plea is satisfactory, and the judge in such cases generally urges the prisoner who has so pleaded to change his plea. A criminal is not always able to determine the kind or degree of his legal guilt; and numerous instances have occurred where, after a prisoner has retracted his plea of guilty and pleaded not guilty, he has either been entirely acquitted of the charge, or found guilty only of the minor offence. By substituting a declaration on the part of the prisoner that he wishes to be tried for the plea of not guilty, the real meaning of that plea would be expressly stated, and what operates as an impediment in many cases to the proper administration of justice, removed. I am not aware that the supporters of this amendment have any thing to contend with, except the attachment to ancient forms which influences so powerfully many minds. This, though on the whole a laudable feeling where the matter is one of entire indifference, can scarcely be considered as a sufficient ground for resisting a useful and legitimate and practical change.

Mr. Denman's "Felony and Misdemeanour Bill" provided that upon every trial for felony or misdemeanour, where the prisoner or defendant was defended by counsel, and such counsel at the close of the prosecutor's case did not announce his intention to adduce evidence, the counsel for the prosecution should be allowed to sum up the evidence; and that on every trial for felony or misdemeanour, the prisoner or defendant, or his counsel, should in every case where he has adduced evidence, be allowed to sum up such evidence. The practice which the Bill sought to introduce into criminal trials, has been found to work extremely well in the trial of civil causes, into which it was introduced by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. To quote from Mr. Denman's speech on moving the second reading of the Bill:—"That practice had been adopted for the last six years in the trial of civil actions, and it had been found to afford great facilities for the discovery of truth; a great deal of time had also been saved by it through the prevention of much fruitless cross-examination of witnesses, as well as of those lengthened anticipatory observations which counsel, not having the right of reply, were obliged to address to the jury, in order to meet every conceivable turn which the case was likely to take. From not being allowed to sum up the evidence at the close, the prisoner's counsel were frequently deterred from calling important witnesses, merely because they could not tell what would be the effect on the jury if these witnesses were shaken in some immaterial part of their testimony."

These and other arguments of Mr. Denman were not met at the time, or in any subsequent discussion on the Bill either in the House of Commons or the House of Lords. If the practice of allowing counsel to sum up be desirable in civil trials, the same rule should prevail in criminal proceedings. It is one great peculiarity of our judicial system that the rules with regard to the admission of evidence, and the mode in which it is presented to the jury, apply equally to both; and it is difficult to see on what ground any exception to this principle can be maintained.

There are some other provisions with regard to evidence in civil actions in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which might also be introduced into criminal proceedings. I allude to the allowing of an affirmation instead of an oath, where the witness has conscientious objections to be sworn, and the provisions with regard to a party discrediting his own witness, cross-examination as to previous statements in writing, the proof of conviction of a witness, the proof of attested instruments to the validity of which attestation is not necessary, and the comparison of a disputed writing with a writing proved to be genuine. Whatever tends to the discovery of truth in civil proceedings, must be equally advantageous in criminal; and there can be no sufficient reason why it should not be adopted in the latter, where it would equally operate in favour of the accused and of the prosecutor.

Although I would propose the extension of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, with regard to allowing an affirmation in certain cases instead of an oath to criminal proceedings, I should by no means regard this as a final settlement of the question. The whole subject of oaths requires to be considered with reference to modern ideas and feelings. The practice of solemnly appealing to the Supreme Being can only be vindicated on the ground of necessity, and such necessity cannot be shown to exist by any arguments of a satisfactory character. No appeal of this nature can render the obligation to speak the truth stronger than it is felt to be by every honest and upright man who appears as a witness with simple reference to the ends of justice; and where this obligation is not felt, I have little faith in mere superstitious feeling, the nature of which is to be conveniently elastic. Let there be a simple declaration that the witness will speak the truth, and let wilfully false evidence be punished in the same manner that perjury now is; and no evil, I firmly believe, would be found to have arisen from dispensing with a most objectionable formality.

There were several proposals made by Mr. Pitt Taylor, a few years ago, for amending the law touching procedure and evidence, which were embodied in a Bill introduced by Sir F. Kelly in 1856. Some of these have special reference to criminal proceedings; and I would particularly call attention to a proposal for abolishing the rule which excludes from the consideration of the jury material statements made by a prisoner, because the prosecutor or a policeman may have suggested to him that it would be better for him to tell the truth or the like. It is impossible to read the cases on this subject without seeing how much important evidence has been excluded by this rule. Such evidence would, no doubt, always be liable to observation, and in some cases, it might, perhaps, be shown to be worthless; but this can be no reason why admissions bearing directly on the issue to be tried, should not be brought before the jury. The object of all the amendments in the law of evidence in modern times has been to make the jury the judges of the value of whatever tends to throw light on the matter in issue, instead of excluding it from their consideration on a presumption of its inferior worth. The English law of evidence is certainly based on sound and substantial principles, and is without doubt one of the noblest achievements of the human intellect in the history of jurisprudence. The distinctions which it draws between what is admissible and what is not, have in general some foundation more or less solid; but its error has lain in excluding what was of inferior value, instead of admitting it, and estimating it at what it was worth. The latter is the principle of all recent amendments in the law of evidence, and I think it would be desirable to introduce it with reference to the matter to which I have now alluded.

Lord Brougham's "Law of Evidence Further Amendment Bill" provided that any person on trial for felony or misdemeanour might offer himself as a witness in his own behalf, subject to cross-examination like any other witness called in behalf of such person. The provision applied also to the wife or husband of such person. Although I approve strongly of the principle of this measure, yet, as the subject will be shortly brought before the Society by the committee who have been considering it, I do not think it advisable to enter into the question at present.

A committee of this Society, appointed in 1858 to consider the rule requiring unanimity of juries, reported, as to juries in criminal cases, "that the rule which requires their unanimous verdict ought not to be altered, the rule being grounded on the principle, that before any man is convicted of crime, such evidence should be adduced as will satisfy the minds of twelve jurors." When the report was discussed, the general feeling seemed to be very strongly in favour of this view of the committee; but as considerable difference of opinion existed as to the unanimity of juries in civil trials, it was finally resolved simply to receive the report of the committee. I should not certainly be inclined to propose any change in the rule with regard to juries in criminal cases, but I would strongly recommend that one restriction relating to juries should be abolished, viz. the denial of meat, drink, and fire to juries who have retired to consider their verdicts, a restriction opposed to all humane feeling and all enlightened reason. Another improvement which might be safely adopted, would be to provide that, after deliberation for a certain number of hours, the jury, if at the end of that they had not agreed on their verdict, should be discharged, where a majority so requested. I would also suggest, that the rule which requires juries, where a trial for felony is adjourned, to be taken charge of by the sheriff, and kept together by him, should be abolished. There can be no valid reason for adopting a proceeding in trials for felony, which is not considered necessary in trials for misdemeanour and in civil trials; and I cannot believe that any evil would arise from the juries being allowed to go to their own homes, which would at all justify a system productive of great inconvenience and hardship to men who are called on to discharge a public duty.

The subject of an appeal in criminal cases on the facts, has excited considerable public attention during the last few years. Although the importance of the subject has been felt by many members of this society, yet the difficulties which environ the question have prevented its being taken up here, and the feeling amongst members generally, as far as I have learned is, that it is better for us to wait until a satisfactory scheme is proposed, than to attempt to bring forward any plan which might be liable to great objections. The Bill of Mr. McMahon provided that the Court of Queen's Bench might grant a certiorari after the trial of any indictment with a view to a new trial. But the difficulties connected with such a plan are very great; and they seem to have been felt so strongly by the House of Commons, that the Bill was thrown out last session on the second reading. After Mr. McMahon's measure was negatived, Sir Fitzroy Kelly gave notice of a Bill on the same subject, but as this appeared to be against one of the rules of the House, no further step was taken by him in the matter. It is expected that Sir F. Kelly will bring forward his measure during next session, and it is greatly to be hoped that it may prove to be of a satisfactory character. The system followed at the Home Office is certainly objectionable, the Home Secretary has no means of confronting witnesses, and testing the truth of their evidence in the manner which is considered satisfactory in all judicial proceedings. Subject, however, to any change in my opinion on this question which may be produced by the measure of Sir F. Kelly, should it be brought forward during the next session, I cannot but think that the plan suggested by Lord Brougham is the best that could be adopted. His suggestion was, that a Committee of the Privy Council should be appointed, in the same manner as the Judicial Committee, to whom it should be lawful for her Majesty to refer any question that might arise as to whether any sentence should be executed, and that such committee should investigate the facts alleged and report thereon to her Majesty. A committee, admirably qualified for considering such questions, might be formed of ex-judges; and under any circumstances, the expense of conducting the investigation would be much smaller and the delay less, than would be possible under any scheme which proposed a new trial, as the means of correcting an improper verdict.

There is another matter connected with criminal procedure on which I am anxious to say a few words before concluding. I refer to the consolidation of the statute law on this subject. A Bill of this nature was prepared by Mr. T. Chandlee, junior, and myself in the year 1836, for the statute law commission; but nothing has been since done with this Bill, as far as I am aware, except its being laid on the table of the House of Lords at the end of the session of 1856 by the then Lord Chancellor, although its importance in a practical point of view is certainly not less than that of the Criminal Law Consolidation Bills which were brought in during last session, and which it was understood the Government were anxious to press forward.

The Bill to which I refer consolidated forty-two Acts and parts of Acts relating to procedure on the trial of indictable offences. The statutes on this subject commence with the 6th year of Henry VI., and the different provisions are scattered over the statute book in a manner sufficiently perplexing to any one who is not content to rely on the authority of the text-books. The Bill contained 139 clauses, and combined the different provisions according to an arrangement which was deemed the most convenient. That arrangement may perhaps be liable to objection; but at all events, the Bill brought together the whole of the statutes on the subject of criminal procedure, and exhibited them in a manner which would have been highly useful for practical purposes. But whatever may be thought of the Bill to which I refer, there can be no doubt that a consolidation of the statute law relating to criminal procedure is highly desirable, and ought speedily to be accomplished.

HINTS TO ARTICLED CLERKS.

No. II.

THE ARTICLED CLERK'S CONDUCT IN THE OFFICE.

During the first few months that the clerk is in the office, he will probably find his thoughts sufficiently occupied by learning just what any law stationer must know—the differences between rough drafts and fair copy drafts; between foolscap and brief paper; and a hundred other minutiae which seem unimportant enough, but are, nevertheless, necessary to be known. We remember hearing a shrewd old solicitor, who did the conveyancing for half a county, attribute part of his success to the fact that he never allowed a dirty-looking draft, or a badly engrossed deed, to go out of his office. No unprofessional man, said he, can tell whether a deed is properly drawn, but everybody knows at once whether it is well written. Unless during his clerkship the attorney has paid some attention even to such matters as the proper engrossment of deeds, he will not be able to exercise that amount of supervision over his clerks which will ensure their turning out their work in the most approved fashion; and while he is putting forth all his skill and learning to draw effectual assurances in the law, he may be losing a client merely because his clerk has sent home to him a shabby-looking engrossment. However, when the articulated clerk has acquired some knowledge of the more mechanical part of his work, he should begin seriously to endeavour to learn its scope and meaning. It is necessary that he should perform many of the duties of the copying clerk; but he must not be a mere copying clerk. While his pen is busy, his brain should not be at rest. For example, let us suppose that he is copying an abstract of title. He may do this intelligently or unintelligently. He will do it unintelligently if he is content merely to make a neat copy, and to hand it in to his principal, knowing as much about it as if he had copied so many pages from a book in an unknown tongue. He will do it intelligently if, as he proceeds, he notices the successive links in the chain of title, any breaks which may occur in that chain, and asks himself how they may best be supplied. The dullest man, however, can hardly suppose that he will learn much from merely copying, unless he thinks about his work; but he may be deceived greatly as to the valuable results to be derived from drawing instruments. It is not an uncommon thing for the principal to place in the clerk's hands instructions for a conveyance or mortgage, and for the clerk to fill up the outline thus presented to him by culling a selection of forms from Jarman or Davidson. Now, this clearly requires more thought than simple copying, and yet the clerk who does it may fail to derive much benefit from it. The instructions placed before him are generally so precise and definite, as not to leave much room for mistake; and wherever this is the case, drawing does not, of itself, convey much more instruction than copying. Where such instructions are given, the clerk, not satisfied with merely following them, should look at the abstract, and at the contract of sale, in order to ascertain how it is that such and such persons are to be made parties, and that such and such covenants and provisos are to be inserted. If, indeed, his principal should hand to him the abstract and the contract, merely telling him to draw such a conveyance as he thinks is required, then he must look into the matter for himself, and it would be well, perhaps, if this course was more frequently followed, as it would compel the clerk to fall back upon his own resources. Generally speaking, however, our readers will find that they may, if they like, walk in leading strings during the whole of their clerkship. We wish to impress it upon them that they ought not to be content to do so. They must walk alone when once they have been admitted, and they will not find it a very easy task unless they have accustomed themselves to it during their clerkship.

Wherever it is practicable the clerk should endeavour to see the whole course of the matters before him, from their commencement to their conclusion. Thus, to revert to conveyancing, from which we have already drawn an illustration, he should, when he knows that a sale by auction of real property is about to be conducted by his principals, peruse the advertisement and particulars and conditions, attend the sale, go through the abstract, see what requisitions are made upon it, and how they are complied with, and finally criticise the draft conveyance prepared by the purchaser's solicitor. In the same way he should watch actions and suits from the beginning to the end of the chapter, not forgetting that most important finale to all legal business—the bill of costs. It will, of course, frequently happen that the clerk will not have the opportunity of seeing all the steps which are taken in the progress of conveyancing and contentious business; but he will always be able to see the bills made out against clients for work done, and in them he will, if they are properly drawn, find a complete history of the transaction. Viewed in this light, it will be seen that hardly any documents in the office are more deserving of the clerk's study and attention, answering the same purpose as charts and maps to the traveller or navigator.

Much benefit will be derived from a frequent attendance at courts of all kinds, from those in Westminster-hall down to petty sessions. We are inclined to think, from our own experience, that many articulated clerks are too prone to neglect this very interesting mode of self-improvement, and that they consequently lose some golden opportunities of success. When a young man commences his career as an attorney, it is of the highest importance to him that he should not only be learned in his profession, but that he should be able to show that he is so. Now it is not very easy to demonstrate to a client that his conveyance or mortgage is drawn upon the most scientific principles, and displays a profound acquaintance with real property law, but a client can very easily judge whether his attorney has or has not conducted his case well before justices or before a county court. He cannot, it is true, pronounce any opinion worth having upon the soundness of his advocate's law, but he is quite competent to form a judgment as to his coolness, his self-possession, his tact, and his fluency or otherwise of his speech. A man who is not familiar with the routine of courts soon shows his defects to the most inexperienced observer; whereas one who has diligently frequented them not only acquires a great deal of real knowledge but also the valuable art of concealing his ignorance. In the office the articulated clerk may learn a great deal of law, but in courts he learns how men and facts are to be dealt with—a knowledge by which many men whose law might almost be represented by a cypher, have attained to name and fortune. And indeed, there is one head of law which, for all useful and practical purposes must be studied in court, and that is the law of evidence. We do not mean that the student ought not to read Taylor or Best, or whatever treatise on the subject he may prefer; but this reading will be of very little service to him unless he assiduously complements it by observing how evidence is adduced in actual trials; what objections are made to its admissibility and how those objections are met. And here we think it desirable to caution the student against a mistake into which he is not unlikely to fall if he is articulated in an office where the business mainly, if not altogether, consists of conveyancing. There are many such offices and, owing to the rank they hold, parents are very naturally disposed to select them as the avenues through which their sons are to be introduced into the profession. The clerk, however, whose lot is cast in such an office while attending diligently to the very valuable instruction he may receive there in real property law, must remember that conveyancing is only one branch of the profession, and that he ought assiduously to embrace every opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the other branches. There is a disposition in conveyancers, how it arises we know not, rather to look down upon advocates and common law practitioners. The young attorney, however, will not generally find that his earliest clients are vendors and purchasers, mortgagors and mortgagees, but rather debtors and creditors, plaintiffs and defendants, prosecutors and prisoners. If during his clerkship he has addicted himself entirely to the study of conveyancing, he will probably find himself outstripped in the race for success by men of much less ability and learning; but who have directed their attention to that class of business which is usually confided to junior practitioners. We have known men of great personal respectability, and possessing a thorough knowledge of conveyancing, who have failed in the profession, because they had neither the connection nor the capital to command that business with which they were acquainted, while they knew nothing of advocacy or common law. On the other hand, a fluent tongue, a clear head, a respectable, although by no means a profound knowledge of the law of contracts, of evidence, and of the routine of courts, have proved invaluable to their possessors as the foundation of professional reputation. We do not care how often we seem to repeat ourselves if we can only impress upon the clerk that however desirable it may be, and undoubtedly is, that he should be a sound lawyer, it is equally necessary that he should possess tact, knowledge of actual business, of men, and of the world. Such knowledge is not to be acquired from books, or even at the desk, but is to be picked up now by a chat with an old managing clerk, now in an auction room, now in courts, and in a hundred different ways which will readily suggest themselves to an intelligent young man. We think it right to warn our readers against a practice by which we wasted much of our own time, and by which they may perhaps be tempted to waste much of theirs, and that is the copying of precedents. We have in our possession a large volume of manuscript common forms, which during nine years of practice we never used, and from the copying of which we learned almost nothing. There are now so many valuable printed collections of precedents that it is mere labour in vain to make a collection for one's self with a view to future practice, while the time spent in copying would be much more usefully employed in studying principles or in attending to actual office business. During the first year of his clerkship, the student who will meet with many words and terms of art which are utterly unknown to him will find it very advantageous to have lying on his desk Mr. Wharton's Law Lexicon, to which he may refer for information. When the course of his reading has become a little more extended, he will be able to refer to the ordinary treatises and text books, because he will then have learned where subjects can be best looked up; but in the meantime he will find Mr. Wharton's dictionary arrangement invaluable. We may now conclude these hints with regard to the conduct in the office, by impressing upon the mind of the articulated clerk the fact that he will find it to his interest, as it is his duty, to make himself useful to his principal. If he does so he will be gradually intrusted with business entailing more of responsibility and requiring more of care and thought in its transaction. Thus his opportunities of learning will be vastly increased, and not only so, for he will build up for himself a character which upon his entrance into professional life will be of the utmost advantage to him.

ATMOSPHERIC CLOCKS, OR MERCURIAL

TIMEKEEPERS.—These ingenious and simple timekeepers are the most remarkable scientific novelties of the day. They indicate time by the gradual descent of a column of mercury, in a glass tube, which, when descended, or nearly so, the clock merely requires to be reversed. In appearance they resemble the thermometer. Prices 4s. 6d., 5s., 10s. 6d., 12s. 6d., 15s., and upwards. The Guinea Clock with Silver Dial makes an elegant present. They are adapted for all climates, never get out of repair, nor require cleaning. For India and the colonies they are very suitable. Orders, accompanied with a remittance or post-office order, payable to C. LANGSTON, Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C., will meet with prompt attention. Export orders shipped direct to any part of the world, and commissions for other goods at the same time executed on the best terms. Wholesale, Retail, and Export Depot of the Atmospheric Clock Company, 73, Fleet-street, E.C. Orders received for CLEGG'S PATENT VICTORIA GARDEN PUMPS, and for CLEGG'S PATENT CARRIAGE TELEGRAPH, or DRIVER'S GUIDE, which will entirely supersede the ordinary check-string.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Elsewhere in our columns will be found, at length, the return which the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery has presented to Parliament, shewing the state of the Suits' Fund and Suits' Fee Fund when the balances were last struck. The Suits' Fund account is made up to the 1st of October last, and the Suits' Fee Fund account to the 25th of November. There appears to be no reason why these two accounts should include different periods. It would seem to be a more convenient course to balance both upon the same day. We have given all the items and figures in detail, in order that our readers may be fully in possession of much important information touching some of the subjects now about to be investigated by the Chancery Commission, which has just been appointed. Next week we shall give an abstract of these accounts, so as to present a more general view of them. In round numbers the fees levied on the suits in the Court of Chancery during the year ending 25th November, 1860, are a little short of £100,000, while the entire disbursements are considerably over £200,000. The difference is more than made up by the income arising from the large funds of the court. The annual expenditure for compensations is about two-thirds of the amount required to pay all the acting officers of the court. The pensions to retired officers, amounting to over £12,000 a year, are not included in these compensations. These figures will suffice to shew that the new commissioners have some real work to do even though, as report says, they are confined by the terms of their commission to inquiries into the constitution of the Accountant-General's department, and the provisions for the custody and management of the funds of the court.

A return has been made to Parliament, on the motion of Mr. Malins, of the statistics of the Probate and Divorce Courts, of the latter of which we have elsewhere given an analysis. The Times has an article based upon this parliamentary paper in favour of the appointment of another judge who might attend to the business of the Probate Court alone. We cannot help thinking, however, that the return in question would not be a sufficient justification for so important and expensive a proceeding. Although the Court has been three years in existence, a considerable proportion of the causes now coming before it would unquestionably have been disposed of years before if there had been jurisdiction to try them. It is not fair then to draw any conclusion from the statistics which have been recently furnished to Parliament; and from the experience which has been gained since 1858 there is little reason to doubt that after a short time the probate and divorce business together will not be more than sufficient to give full employment to one judge.

The appellants in the case of All Souls' College, Oxford, have succeeded on the most important points; and in future the Foundation Fellowships of that College will probably be given to successful candidates in competitive examinations in the subjects of jurisprudence and modern history—some regard, of course, being had to moral fitness.

The office of Legal Adviser to the Metropolitan Board of Works has become vacant upon the appointment of Mr. Woolrych as a magistrate at the Thames Police Court. We believe the appointment rests with the Board, and that the salary is £1,000 a-year, together with certain fees of no inconsiderable amount.

LORD ST. LEONARDS' BILL ON CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE.

We have so frequently adverted to Lord St. Leonards' repeated attempts to abolish the equitable doctrine of constructive notice, that we should not now allude to this topic at any length, if it were not that the Bill at present before Parliament, which embodies his lordship's views, is likely to become law without receiving any discussion in either House. The Bill proposes that no purchaser for value or mortgagee shall be bound by any implied or constructive notice, unless the Court shall be of opinion that his conduct "amounted to fraud, or to such wilful neglect as amounted to fraud." We do not pause here to offer any lengthened criticism upon the awkwardness and inaptness of the language which we have just quoted. It may be observed, however, that upon the principle that things which are equal to the same, are equal to one another, the term last introduced into the proposed enactment is unnecessary and illogical. No object appears to be gained by adding to the exception "unless the Court shall be of opinion that the conduct of such purchaser or mortgagee amounted to fraud," the further exception "or to such wilful neglect as amounted to fraud." The latter exception appears to be even in terms included in the former, and to be, therefore, simply supererogatory and embarrassing. It is not to be supposed, however, that so learned and great a lawyer as Lord St. Leonards (assuming the addition in question to have been made by him), has used these words without meaning. The truth is, they are a forcible proof of the extreme embarrassment which must attend any attempt of the Legislature to meddle with this most comprehensive and complicated head of equity. The immense difficulty of the whole subject may be inferred from the fact that no English lawyer has ever yet had the courage to grapple with it in its entirety. Amongst the multitudinous treatises which issue from our legal press, not one has ever appeared upon the subject of constructive notice, although the applications of the doctrine are infinite, and the reported cases relating to it innumerable. The reason of this is probably not less on account of the conflict and obscurity which characterise judicial decisions involving the doctrine of notice, than because of its almost purely metaphysical character, and therefore the absence of such objective coherence as is desirable in any branch of law which is intended for the subject of a separate work. Another reason unquestionably is the almost insuperable difficulty arising out of the uncertain use of terms where so much depends upon accurate definition.

It would not be difficult, if our space permitted, to point out numerous examples where actual, express, direct, or immediate notice has been in terms confounded with constructive, implied, or imputed notice. There have been numerous attempts to define and explain in general terms the cases coming within these two general classes; but out of all these judicial definitions no text writer or judge has yet been able to construct any intelligible system. Efforts have been made from time to time, both in courts of common law and courts of equity, to define notice simply as knowledge; and as applied to a person, either that he knows or ought to know the fact or circumstances in question. But, however desirable for their simplicity these definitions might be, they have been found practically insufficient and unsuitable for the purposes of jurisprudence; and even though they were not so, the distinctions thus laid down are not coincident with the divisions of actual and constructive notice. The first step, therefore, which Lord St. Leonards has to take, is attended with the utmost embarrassment. The very terms which he is compelled to use are indefinite beyond all others in English law. Every lawyer can lay his hand upon conflicting judicial dicta as to the meaning of the term "constructive" or "implied" notice when it is used for the purpose of being distinguished from express or actual notice. Indeed, in a very large class of cases the term "constructive notice" stands for nothing more than actual (considered as including potential) knowledge. It is said that a person knowing so much ought to have known more; as where one knows the contents of a deed, and ought, therefore, to have acquainted himself with some facts therein revealed which affect his title. Although the term constructive-notice has been generally applied to this class of cases, some judges have with reason preferred to include them in the category of actual notice. There is another class of cases which have been commonly treated as coming under the head of constructive notice, but in reference to which similar observations may be made. Thus, a man buys an estate, some portion of which may be, (unknown to him) in the possession of a tenant; and the purchaser will be held to have constructive notice of whatever rights may be in the tenant, inasmuch as the purchaser must be held to have been aware of the possession of the tenant, although in fact it was otherwise. But although such a case as this might be fairly classed under the head of constructive notice, there appears to be no more reason why the possession of the tenant under such circumstances should not be deemed actual notice than in the case of a bill of exchange, where a formal notice of dishonour (than which nothing can be more express or direct) by some accident or miscarriage fails to reach the person for whom it is intended. The same kind of remark applies to the case of statutory notices by railway companies, carriers and others; they are in themselves unquestionably express and direct; but, nevertheless, they fail frequently to convey actual knowledge to the parties who are to be thereby affected; so that they may be said to have only constructive notice of what is so notified. Yet it has always been the custom to treat this large class of cases as governed by the doctrine of actual notice. Unnumbered decided cases would enable us to mention many other illustrations of the great difficulty of attempting any definition of implied or constructive notice, as distinguished from what is express or actual. We must content ourselves, however, with merely suggesting one or two others. Thus, a public Act of Parliament has been held to be notice; but is it express or constructive? Registration of deeds is not of itself notice, except it can be shown that the party to be affected, or his agent, has searched the register; but is such notice actual or constructive? The most important question to be settled will be that of agency for the purpose of notice. The old formula was that actual notice to an agent was constructive notice to the principal; and perhaps inasmuch as notice is said to operate by affecting the conscience, where fraud is imputed, the principal cannot be held to have, if in fact he has not, actual knowledge. Yet it has been expressly laid down (Tunstall v. Trappes, 3 Sim. 301,) that actual notice to the agent is actual notice to the principal. Supposing, however, the old enunciation of the doctrine to be correct, is it possible that according to Lord St. Leonards' Bill a principal shall ever be affected where the notice to his agent is only constructive, even admitting that the conduct of the agent "amounted to fraud?"

The original foundation of the entire doctrine of notice, whether actual or constructive, in courts of equity, and to some extent also at common law, was fraud or mala fides. In equity, fraud and notice have always been considered theoretically coincident. As notice was sometimes constructive, so also was fraud. Mere negligence to inquire, unless it were crassa negligentia, or so gross as to be evidence of fraud, has never involved in courts of equity the penalty of implied notice. The whole doctrine proceeds upon the notion that without it men might, by merely shutting their eyes, defraud their neighbours. There is no conclusive rule, either in equity or at law, that because a person has the means of knowledge he should therefore be taken to have acquired it. In equity, at least, it is always implied that there has been a fraudulent intention in not acquiring it; or that public policy requires that if such fraudulent intention does not, in fact, appear to exist, it is necessary, nevertheless, to assume its existence. If this be so, is there not some reason to anticipate that Lord St. Leonards' Bill, should it become law, must be altogether nugatory? If already notice is implied only when there is fraud, actual or constructive, is not the law the same now as it will be after the passing of the Act? No doubt, a substantive enactment may affect the rules of pleading, and certain doctrines, such as those relating to acquiescence, mistake, laches, waiver, puisne purchasers, solicitor and client, principal and agent, and many other collateral topics; but such is evidently not the intention of the noble framer of the Bill, nor can it be supposed that there would be any advantage from these indirect effects of an enactment which failed in its immediate object.

Almost every Chancellor for the last thirty years has expressed his dislike of any further extension of the doctrine of constructive notice; and yet from time to time it has been pushed very much beyond its true ground and original foundation. The question is whether the doctrine can be most effectually confined to its just limits by such a measure as that which is now before Parliament? We think that we have stated enough to raise a suspicion at least that Lord St. Leonards' Bill will be ineffectual, and to suggest that the subject is one more suited for judicial than legislative settlement.

THE LAWS OF MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

The case of Thelwall v. Yelverton, recently determined in the Irish Court of Common Pleas, and upon which we offered some general comments in last week's Journal, promises to be the pivot of a thorough reformation in the marriage code of the United Kingdom. The facts of that case it is unnecessary to detail. They are now sufficiently known, and furnish abundant material for a seven-act play. The action was brought to recover a sum of money for necessities supplied to the wife of the defendant. The defence was a denial that the person to whom the necessities were supplied was the wife of the defendant. Two marriages were relied on by the plaintiff, one of which was alleged to have occurred in Scotland; the other was admitted to have been performed in Ireland. The Scotch marriage consisted of the joint reading of the Church of England marriage service by the then happy pair, in Edinburgh, in the year 1857. The defendant, Major Yelverton, informed Miss Teresa Longworth that the law of Scotland required merely mutual assent and promises to constitute a marriage, and that the intervention of a priest and witnesses was unnecessary. Miss Longworth, however, it is said, refused to live with the defendant until the ceremony should be duly performed according to the rites of the Roman Catholic religion, which she professes. Accordingly, in August of the same year, they were married by the priest of Rostrevor. A verdict has been found for the plaintiff upon the issues raised as to both marriages, and two exceptions, founded upon the alleged infirmity of each marriage, have been taken to the charge of Lord Chief Justice Monaghan.

The first exception is based upon the fact disclosed in Mrs. Yelverton's evidence that she did not regard the Scotch marriage as "final, absolute, and unconditional," but contemplated a further ceremony according to the Roman Catholic ritual. This the exception assumes to be an incomplete marriage according to the law of Scotland. The second exception is based upon the Irish Act 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, which invalidates marriages celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, unless both parties shall have professed the Roman Catholic religion for the preceding twelvemonth; while it subjects the priest who contravenes its provisions to the penalties of felony. The weight of moral as well as of legal evidence appears to incline towards proof of the Scotch marriage. Its actual occurrence, indeed, may admit of some doubt; but, as Major Yelverton recognised Mrs. Yelverton as his lawful wife upon several occasions subsequent to the period at which this marriage is sworn by Mrs. Yelverton to have occurred, the requirements of the Scotch law appear to have been sufficiently complied with.

With regard to the facility with which a marriage can be contracted in Scotland, we really must congratulate our unmarried metropolitan readers upon the several degrees of latitude which intervene between their domiciles and the land of cakes. How Malthus would have gnashed his teeth had he known how facile the Scotch law is to those who seek the matrimonial tie! The Irish law, however, appears to be strict enough in all conscience as to mixed marriages. These, if celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest, are altogether null, and the priest is made liable to the penalties of felony. The Lord Chancellor, in moving, on the 12th inst., for a select committee to consider the law respecting the parties entitled to sue in the Divorce Court in England and in the Court of Session in Scotland, stated that the Scotch judges consider that they have jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage of parties who happen to have sojourned for forty days within the realm of Scotland, as also over all native Scotchmen in whatever country they may have become domiciled. We venture again to congratulate our readers and ourselves that we are not all within the grasp of the Scotch judges, and hope that the telegraph wires do not place us in constructive contact with their ambitious tribunals. The Yelverton case appears to have suggested not only the appointment of this select committee, but also the Bill regarding mixed marriages in Ireland, just introduced by Lord Campbell, inasmuch as Mrs. Yelverton sued some time ago, in the Divorce Court in London, for a restitution of conjugal rights, but necessarily failed, as the jurisdiction of the Court is confined to England.

As the public law of Europe holds a marriage that is valid in the country in which it has been celebrated valid in all other countries, it is manifest that uniformity of the laws of marriage in the different states of Europe, should be sought by all governments to be realized as approximately as possible. Such a uniformity, however, cannot be enforced by any one or more states, and can only be the work of time and of a discreet diplomacy. But that the laws of marriage should be uniform and homogeneous in the United Kingdom, which is governed by a single Legislature, is as feasible as it is desirable, and is, we hope, upon the point of being accomplished. It may not be uninteresting very briefly to detail the causes and stages of the discrepancies in the marriage laws of the British Isles. Our readers are, of course, aware that the ecclesiastical law of England is based upon the canon, and not upon the common, law, if, indeed, there ever existed any common law on the subject. Our ecclesiastical law still conforms to the canon law in all cases to which special legislation has not been applied. Prior to the Reformation, the ecclesiastical law of the United Kingdom, and, indeed, of all Europe, was almost one and the same. Dispensations could then be obtained for the class of disabilities termed canonical in special cases, and the present codes of European States vary only to the extent in which they render such disabilities conclusive and permanent impediments to marriage. As to civil disabilities, European law, except in Turkey, presents hardly any variety. Prior to the Council of Trent, the intervention of a priest was not necessary to constitute a valid marriage according to the canon law. The general maxim of the canonists was "Consensus non concubitus facit nuptias." Cohabitation was only necessary when the original contract consisted merely of a promise to marry in futuro. A valid contract to marry was thus completed either by a present agreement, or by a promise followed by cohabitation, aut per verba de presenti aut per verba de futuro cum copulâ. The Scotch law strictly corresponds with these rules. The adherence of Scotland to these principles of the old canon law is perhaps to be attributed not only to the preponderance of the canon and civil laws over the common law throughout its entire jurisprudence, but also to the dislike for liturgy and ceremonial indigenous to a Presbyterian creed. The English law, prior to the Marriage Act of George II., did not differ much from the ante-Tridentine canon law. Prior to that Act, a promise to be performed in futuro could be enforced by a specific performance in facie ecclesie. This Act altered the law in this respect, and also rendered necessary the publication of banns or a licence, the consent of a parent or guardian in cases of minors, and the intervention of a celebrant in holy orders. The Marriage Act, 4th Geo. 4, c. 76, confirmed these provisions, but introduced no new principle. The 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 85, has secularized the solemnity, and rendered the intervention of a clergyman no longer indispensable. His function may be performed by the registrar, a three weeks' notice to the latter being substituted for publication of banns. An English marriage may, therefore, now be celebrated according to the requirements prescribed by either of these statutes, or partly according to each, the superintendent registrar's certificate being equivalent to a publication of the banns, if a party prefer it to the latter, and desire a celebration in a church.

We entirely concur with the judicious observations of The Times of the 12th inst., upon the absurdity of the allegation that Irish and Scotch marriages concern only Irishmen and Scotchmen. Not only is this assertion unfounded and erroneous, but, owing to the rule of international law which we have mentioned, each State in Europe is interested in the marriage codes of all the rest in proportion to the degree of its intercourse with them. The rule, indeed, itself cannot be altered; for, if it were different, a man might have a wife in several States, and not be liable to punishment for bigamy in any. Every State should, therefore, endeavour to render the marriage laws of all other States conformable to the Divine law, and assimilated to its own. If, indeed, a foreign code admit of marriages which our law deems morally wrong, these will be invalid in England. But the boundaries of moral right and wrong should not be left to judicial discretion in cases involving the most important social interests. The case of Brook & Brook, now before the House of Lords, illustrates this view. Vice-Chancellor Stuart, assisted by Sir C. Cresswell, had decided in this case that marriage with a deceased wife's sister contracted in Denmark and valid there was invalid in this country, both parties being British subjects and domiciled in England. Yet, until the Act of Will. IV: such a marriage could not be invalidated in this country after the death of either of the parties. It was not, therefore, considered prior to that Act to have been a violation of essential morality. But in the Vice-Chancellor's decision such an assumption seems to be implied; as otherwise the general rule of public law would have prevailed with him. But though the conflict of foreign laws with our own cannot be averted at our discretion, we should take care that no such conflict could occur within the British Isles. So far, however, is the law of the three kingdoms from being uniform in this the most important class of contracts, that a marriage may be contracted in Scotland by any promise to that effect, if plausible evidence can be offered to show that it was deliberate and unconditional, vid. Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (A.D. 1811). But a condition sometimes exists and admits of dispute. In the Yelverton case, the desire of Mrs. Yelverton for a Roman Catholic celebration of her marriage does not appear to be in any way connected with the Scotch marriage as a condition attached to it. It was a condition in itself null, not recognised by the law, dehors the Scotch agreement, and was intended to have preceded, not the Scotch marriage, but cohabitation. Now, cohabitation is not necessary to perfect a marriage by the law of Scotland when that marriage is contracted, as in the Yelverton case, per verba de presenti. In Beamish v. Beamish, now before the House of Lords, the question is, whether a Protestant clergyman can by the law of Ireland celebrate his own marriage. In the case of the Queen v. Solly, an Englishman procured in Scotland a divorce from an English marriage, and having subsequently married again in England was convicted of bigamy. Yet a second marriage by Solly in Scotland would have been lawful there. In Tollemache v. Tollemache the wife, after a divorce, married again in Scotland. But the husband not being a domiciled Scotchman, had also to apply for a divorce in England. A wife may obtain in Scotland a divorce upon the ground of the husband's adultery, which alone, without the aggravating circumstances of cruelty or desertion, &c., gives ground in England only for a judicial separation. The Lord Chancellor proposes to give the respective courts of the three kingdoms jurisdiction in cases where the parties have resided in the country for a year or two previous to the application. It would appear more consonant to the general rules of law to make jurisdiction in divorce cases to depend upon the law of the country in which the marriage has been contracted, and not upon the domicile of the applicants. Nihil est majus conveniens naturali equitati quam unum quodque ligamen eo dissolvi quo ligatum est. As to the British Isles, common sense suggests that no question should be capable of arising, either as to the lex loci contractus, or the domicile of the parties, but that there should be one uniform code of matrimonial law for the three kingdoms. Religious ceremonies need not be interfered with by any measure, however comprehensive.

We are sorry to find that the Lord Chancellor is disposed to sanction partial legislation upon this subject. As his Bill is not yet printed, he may be induced to withdraw it; and instead thereof to move for a committee to inquire into the marriage laws of the United Kingdom, with a view to their assimilation. As the fruit of mature deliberation, we should have for the British Isles, if not for the whole empire, a uniform code of the laws relating to marriage and divorce.

LIABILITIES BY SPECIALTY AND BY SIMPLE CONTRACT. — ALLEGED ESSENTIAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN THESE CLASSES OF CONTRACTS.—PROPOSED AMENDMENT.

III.

Pending the revision of the statutes, and the completion of those other sweeping reforms which are much more easily contemplated than realized, we think that the legal public ought not wholly to abandon the less attractive, but not less solid amendments which have been long mooted, and involve no radical experiment. The Real Property Acts of the late and present reigns exemplify the utility of even partial reforms which harmonize with the more fundamental principles of law. The abolition of the present law of specialties is a desideratum so great in the law of personal property, that it appears to us to deserve especial attention even at the present time, when the whole system of our law is promised a restoration to its ancient simplicity. We have shown, in our first paper on this subject,* that sealed documents have had a wholly technical as well as an ignoble origin. The offspring of ignorance was naturally subject to error, and productive of various inconveniences. These we endeavoured to detail and exemplify in our second paper.† We shall now briefly consider the alleged essential distinctions between sealed and parol contracts. But little attention is requisite to show that these distinctions are unreal, and are as technical as any of the best cherished fictions of our law.

The chief argument in favour of the existing distinction between contracts is founded on the assumption that the ceremony of sealing the document of contract tends to induce caution and deliberation in the contracting party. Let us consider for a moment the truth of the assertion, as also its value, even if the fact were proven. We consider that sealing is a mere formality as distinguished from a ceremony. It is as facititious and unconnected with the actual transaction as the stamp which is sometimes affixed for merely fiscal purposes. The covenantor scarcely ever, in fact, seals the deed himself. This is done by the attorney; and we need hardly say that a party does not include sealing in his directions for drafting the deed. How, then, can that induce forethought and deliberation which is not present to the mind? Let us contrast with this almost unperceived rite the very different effects produced upon the mind of a party by the act of signing his name. He knows the effect of doing this in the case of a bill of exchange. It is more forcible in its suggestions, and less vague in its direct import, than sealing and delivery, even though the latter were accompanied with a ceremonious formula which, however, is by no means indispensable. In short, it is the signature to a deed which constitutes the solemnity of the transaction, in point of fact, although it is inoperative in law. Any one upon consulting his own experience will find, that if he ever felt an unusual degree of responsibility upon executing a deed, that feeling arose from two causes—the value of the interest affected by the instrument, and the act of subscribing his name thereto; but he will not remember that the seal made any impression (if the pun be excusable) whatever upon him. Even if deeds had the alleged advantage just inquired into, over unsealed documents, nevertheless, we do not consider that their frequent use should be encouraged, as it is at present, by their monopoly of rights. A deed is too cumbersome and tedious a form of instrument for the common uses of commerce, which disdains wings even of gold and silver for its currency, and will disport readily only by the aid of paper, even though this should be sometimes of an unreal character. The sealing of contracts is manifestly not aerial enough for the purposes of daily commercial life. Let us consider the case of receipt stamps. They are doubtless an impediment to the brisk circulation so vital to trade, and are a tax of inconvenience, independently of their pecuniary amount, upon the inhabitants of remote and thinly peopled districts who may not find them always easily obtainable. Now, if all contracts were required by law to be stamped and sealed, we would consider such a restriction intolerable. We may thus readily infer that the use of specialties is wholly unsuited to the interests of trade.

It may possibly be alleged by those who love fanciful analogies, that a variety of forms of contract facilitates that division of rights in fieri, which is found necessary as to interests in esse, and that, as the right of property may amount either to full or partial dominion and ownership, so also different species of contracts may, according to circumstances, stipulate for different degrees of interest in the subject matter of the contract. But a fallacy lurks in this comparison. It is not the fact that any person desires to purchase an uncertain interest in property for as high a price as he would give for an indefeasible title to the same. This analogy, then, involves a confusion of ideas, and compares what is uncertain but not partial or limited in contracts with actual interests in property that are partial and limited, but not uncertain. A simple contract debt, in short, does not bear the same relation to a debt by specialty that a rent charge or a life estate does to the fee, but is rather to be compared with an estate of any kind that is defective in title. A bad law makes a good one in the same statute-book appear to the greater advantage from such companionship; but it would be a profitable sacrifice of the charms of variety if all laws were equally good. Specialty debts appear to be thus enhanced by the factitious unsoundness of simple contract debts, and not by any intrinsic merits of their own. The phrase "bills, bonds, and notes," indicates a general impression that these securities are to the non-professional mind of co-ordinate effect. But nine-tenths of the general public look upon bonds as eligible securities, not so much on account of their operation as deeds, and their consequent priority to simple contract debts in the administration of assets, as because they abridge process.

* See ante, p. 215.

We have shown in our first paper* that the origin of sealed documents in the East was owing to a desire of keeping secret the contents of the instrument, and that the seal was afterwards transferred from the exterior of the document, its natural place, to the interior, and affixed there as a solemn mode of signature. We next recounted the history of deeds in our own law, and showed that the introduction of the ceremony into England was not owing to any of the advantages alleged to flow from it, but was the result of the ignorance of the Norman nobility, who resorted to the device of sealing, merely because they were not sufficiently literate to sign documents. The custom once introduced followed the usual tendencies of customs to perpetuate themselves, and so it survived the causes to which it owed its establishment. A custom, however, although technical in its origin, should not after the lapse of time be inconsiderately disregarded, just as if it had never existed. It may possibly have been found to subserve some useful purpose, or may have become so interwoven with the general fabric of the law, as not to admit of being easily separated from the adjacent materials. Nothing appears at first view more absurd than the obstinacy with which our law required that the tenant to the præcipe in a recovery should have the legal estate, in order to bar a legal remainder, yet the Act which abolished fines and recoveries, the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74, copies in its Protectorship of the Settlement the very machinery which had been found so technical and intricate. Our second paper was intended to show that sealed documents had not been found to subserve, however indirectly, any useful purpose whatever. No prolific mould had grown over this stratum of feudal débris. On the contrary, it impedes all scientific harmony in the laws of contracts, and has been very effective in producing complications of its own. We endeavoured to show the extent to which the law of sealed documents has operated in this respect, and stated, with an effort towards minute and full detail, the various inconveniences which it has produced both in contracts inter vivos, as also in the administration of assets. Even if these inconveniences never existed, we might doubt the expediency of such technical intricacies, and ask cui bono? But we may take firmer ground, and consider their abolition not only desirable on account of their inherent inutility, but also necessary for the adjustment of the laws of contracts. The existing remedies for the inconveniences we have recounted are, first, the rule of construction which tends to limit the force of covenants to their express terms; thus, cutting down to the rank of simple contract debts many species of liabilities arising under deeds. As examples of these useful anomalies we instanced cases of devastavit. Breaches of trust are also, though less felicitously, exceptions to the general rule. The next compensation for the mischief is to be found in the rule of equity which pays specialty and simple contract debts pari passu so far as the assets are equitable, and, sometimes even in the case of legal assets, accomplishes the same purpose indirectly by means of the rule of marshalling. Parliament has not been unmindful of the necessity of obviating the effects of this common law grievance by express provisions in various statutes, as examples of which we cited the Bankrupt and Winding-up Acts (1848, 1849), as also the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 1. But these are merely exceptions to the general priority of specialty over simple contract debts, and can be hardly said to have obviated to any appreciable extent the general confusion which the law of specialties has caused. The remedy which alone is complete and efficacious is the abolition of the distinctive prerogatives of contracts under seal. We have in these papers treated of sealed documents only in respect of their application to contracts which rest in feri. As to actual conveyances and charges which create a specific lien upon the property to which they attach and enable the incumbrancer or mortgagee to follow the property after a sale to a purchaser, we do not seek to have the present law altered in respect to such transactions. These are infrequent as compared with general engagements, and effect a conveyance of an interest in the specific property, without coming into collision with the other debts of the mortgagor. Indeed, a mortgage creates a general liability as well as a specific charge, but that liability is only a simple contract debt. Our observations apply only to contracts, properly so called, which rest in feri, and create no specific charge upon any part of the real or personal property of the debtor. As to general contracts, we think we have conclusively shown that no distinction between them should exist. We do not, however, seek to render the customary evidence of contracts indistinct, or to dispense with any real safeguard against surprise or fraud. Such a protection, we think, is to be found not in sealing and delivery, but in the reduction of the terms of a contract to writing. Writing induces deliberation, caution, and accuracy, and is also valuable as insuring proper evidence of the transaction, littera scripta manet. We therefore consider that contracts should be classified as written or unwritten, and not as sealed or parol. These two classes of contracts do not admit of a confusion of boundaries. Every creditor will know whether he can produce written evidence of the debt due to him, or not. In the present state of the law, equal certainty cannot be obtained by a contract under seal. It may amount to a liability by specialty, or it may not. A contract under seal is, indeed, indispensable, except in cases of rent, to create a debt of such a class. But such a contract without a superadded covenant may be found inadequate to this end. Much technical sagacity is required to determine whether the debt is a specialty or not. Of this we have given abundant proofs. But whether written evidence of a contract be forthcoming or not, is a matter that cannot admit of much doubt. Written documents, then, afford all the advantages supposed to be inherent in sealed ones, and in addition are not liable to the ambiguities at present attaching to the latter. Our proposition, then, is twofold;—the abolition of specialty contracts, and the substitution in their stead of written ones, with, perhaps, the privileges and priority over simple contracts at present incident only to liabilities under seal. The latter point, however, is a question from the discussion of which we have purposely abstained.

We regret to find that Mr. Malins has not given notice this session to introduce again to Parliament his Bill for the abolition of the distinction between special and simple contract debts. His Infants Settlement Act has proved to be a very judicious and useful measure of law reform; and we hope that the credit which Mr. Malins has obtained by the passing of this Act will be an encouragement to him to carry out the important reform in the law of contracts which we have endeavoured to advocate in these papers.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

VIII.

REVERTER OF THE DOMICIL OF ORIGIN.

This branch of the law of domicil has always been, and is now to a certain extent, a texata questio, the various cases that have occurred, generally speaking, rendering it unnecessary from some of their circumstances to decide that question, inasmuch as there has usually been discovered some ground for holding that there has not been an abandonment of an acquired domicil, but that a dying either in itinere or in transitu was sufficient to prevent such abandonment taking effect, although in other respects it was a perfect and absolute abandonment. One of the earlier notices taken of this subject is referred to in the case of Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 379, where the case of Ommaney v. Bingham is adverted to in a note, and it is cited to bring forward the dictum that "Birth might turn the scale if all the other circumstances were in equilibrio;" and Lord Thurlow in Sir Charles Douglas's case is said to have expressed an opinion that it must be presumed when a man abandons an acquired domicil, he intends to resume his native domicil; but the question then naturally arises, what is the value of such a presumption? and whether it comes within the rule now clearly laid down, that an intention is not sufficient, but that there must be an acting upon such intention to acquire a new domicil. Still, however, in the absence of any direct decision on the point, it is necessary to discover, if possible, how the law stands in respect to it.

I have before observed the assumed necessity of abandonment before a new acquirement would seem to take it for granted that a man cannot have two domicils; but the present opinion of the courts appears to be this: although such a thing is or might be imagined to be possible, yet, so slight a circumstance would turn the scale that the possibility is almost ipso facto converted into an impossibility; and the observations of the Master of the Rolls in the case of Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 750, go to this, and it is assumed by Vice-Chancellor Wood in the case of Forbes v. Forbes, 1 Kay 341; 2 Weekly Reporter, 253 (where the case is most excellently reported), that (so far as personal property is concerned) a man cannot have two domicils. If this be so, therefore, the question of reverter occurs, which might not be if it were probable that a domicil of origin and an acquired domicil could subsist at the same time. In the case of Munroe v. Douglas above referred to this question was very much argued, and the doctrine of reverter insisted on, and it may be useful to analyse those arguments. Dr. Munroe was born in Scotland, went to Calcutta, and was appointed assistant surgeon in a company's regiment. Nearly thirty years after he married in India, and having resided there for forty-four years he came to England with an intention, as was said, of spending the remainder of his days in Scotland, and evidence was adduced to prove such intention; but Sir John Leach thought it insufficient. Dr. Munroe then visited Scotland, and died during such visit, and as his wife (the plaintiff) would obtain a larger share of his property by proving a Scotch domicil than an English or Indian one, a Scotch domicil was the one sought to be established on the ground that the acquired domicil in India having been abandoned, the domicil of birth, that is the forum originis, revived.

In support of that proposition, numerous cases were referred to. The first was the case of Bruce v. Bruce, 7 Bro. Parl. Cases, 230; and 2 Bos. & Pull. 230, where Mr. Bruce died in the service of the East India Company; but it was argued that there was a distinction between this which imposed of necessity a local residence, and the case of an officer in the service of the Crown, which it was contended did not constitute a domicil; and a quotation was made from Vattel to the effect that "an intention to remain constituted a domicil, whereas, if a man go to a foreign country, sine animo remanendi, but merely to raise a fortune, it was not so, it being assumed that there was an intention to return to his original home," Orde v. Orde, 8 Dec. "Court of Sessions," p. 49. Vattel, liv. 1, c. 19, s. 218. With reference to the present state of the law, I apprehend that this is true only so far as a professedly temporary residence is concerned, and cannot apply to the case of carrying on a business or trade; indeed, the very contrary was decided in one of the latest, if not the latest case which has occurred upon this point. The case I refer to is that of Lyall v. Paton, 4 Weekly Reporter, 798, which, with the preceding case in the same volume, establishes the proposition that a residence and trading constitutes a domicil; for although the trading is not actually referred to, it appears to be assumed, and indeed it is difficult to suppose that a successful trade would not necessarily involve a length of residence sufficient to acquire a new domicil; although, as I have elsewhere observed length of time is a very indefinite expression, having regard to the decisions on the subject. Another case is Colville v. Lauder, Dictionary of Decisions, 33—34 vols. appendix 9, tit. succession. In that case, a carpenter being a Scotchman by birth, went to the Island of St. Vincent leaving his wife and family at Leith. Four years after, from ill-health, he went to New York, and was drowned in Canada the year after, having written to his father, remitting a sum of money, and stating his intention to return to his native country; and it was held that he must be considered at the time of his death as in transitu to Scotland, and therefore, supposing this as a recognised case, it would in effect support the doctrine of reverter; but this seems quite at variance with the present view taken by the courts, which certainly is, that an acquired domicil is not lost by mere abandonment, and that in such a case the acquired domicil would prevail, and, indeed, Sir John Leach in the case now under consideration so decided, and therefore, I presume, had the case Colville v. Lauder now come before the court, the decision would have been in favour of a domicil in the Island of St. Vincent, and it was admitted that such would have been the case had he died there; it being also admitted that he had acquired a domicil there. The case of Macdonald v. Laing was next cited from the same book ("Dict. of Dec."), p. 4627, which merely went to the point of being in the King's service, not constituting a domicil, a proposition which has never been questioned. The last case upon this point is that of Cockrell v. Cockrell, 4 W. R. 730; where Mr. Cockrell, the testator in the cause, had amassed a large fortune in India during many years residence, but had retained his half pay during the whole time, and that was decided on the probabiles conjecturae, or probable presumptions, that the great gain by the business would have prevailed against the forfeiture of the half pay. In continuing the consideration of the case of Munroe v. Douglas, the next authority cited which I will refer to was the case of Somerville v. Somerville, where it was decided that the mere place of birth or death does not constitute a domicil; the domicil of origin which arises from birth or succession remains until clearly abandoned, and another taken. In that case, there were two acknowledged domicils, the family seat in Scotland, and a leasehold house in London, but under the circumstances the former was held to prevail.

In support of the doctrine of reverter the following passage was cited: Origine propria neminem posse voluntate, sua eximi manifestum est. Cod. Lib. 10, tit. 38, s. 4, p. 422, of the Elsevir edition, 5 Mad. 391; but this appears rather to apply to the case of a necessary domicile, or if not, to assume, that if there is such a thing as reverter, the operation is ipso facto, and without the intervention of the party himself. Voet also is quoted, and the passage there cited clearly refers to a necessary domicile of birth, and goes to show that the domicile of origin would prevail in a doubtful case, which is not at all, I think, in dispute, upon the principle, which is also conceded, that an acknowledged fact remains until the contrary is proved. Comm. ad Pand. lib. 5, tit. 1, pl. 92 at the end. Pothier is likewise referred to in support of the same proposition. See Introduction Générale aux Coutumes, chap. 1, s. 7, although in the conclusion of the quoted passage, it is distinctly laid down that a change of domicile must be justifié, that is, "proved" and carried out by some act before a new one can be acquired. So far, in fact, being a contradiction to the idea of the reverter of a domicile of origin ipso facto. The case of La Virginie, 5 Robinson's Admiralty Reports, 99, was put forward for the purpose of showing the opinion of Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott) that a reverter was easier to prove than a constitution of a new domicile; but this merely decides that there being in one case a certain substratum to build upon, it would prevail in a doubtful case. An unreported case was then cited of Chiens v. Sykes before Sir William Grant, and the reason why it was unreported is obvious, namely, that no decision (except an order being made) was come to upon it. The case was that of a native of Scotland having become a seaman, and although he married at Philadelphia, afterwards coming back to Crail, in Scotland, his native place; and jointly with his brother purchased property there and died. Evidence was gone into before the master on a reference to inquire as to his domicile, and the finding being that it was in Scotland, and, it must be supposed, no exceptions taken, a decree was made accordingly, and that case must have proceeded on the footing that there being no other domicile, the domicile of origin still subsisted, and therefore this was no decision of a reverter. In opposition to the argument that the forum originis revived, many cases and text books were produced, not bearing, however, much on the question of reverter, but chiefly that a domicile was not created by death at a place, or intention merely; and the following passage was read from Denisart, Art. Domicile, 513: "Deux choses sont nécessaires pour constituer le domicile; 1^{re}. L'habitation réelle; 2^{de}. La volonté de la fixer au lieu que l'on habite;" and, therefore, so far a negative argument; and in consonance with what I apprehend to be the present state of the law, it was likewise submitted that an acquired or an original domicile could not be entirely abandoned until another was actually acquired, and that it was not the law that the instant an acquired domicile was quitted the domicile of origin reverted.

VICE-CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Before Vice-Chancellor Sir R. T. KINDERSLEY.)

March 14.—In Re The Northumberland and Durham District Banking Company.—An application was made in this case that a portion of the estates of the company might be sold by auction, notwithstanding that the same property had been sold by private contract.

It was stated in the course of the discussion that counsel had advised that this was a question which ought to have been brought personally before the judge in chambers, but that the chief clerk had refused to adjourn it for that purpose.

The Vice-CHANCELLOR said that he had, over and over again, stated that any party had a right to require that any point should be discussed before the judge in chambers personally; that had always at least been his practice. In the present instance, without imputing anything to the gentlemen who had made the statement as to the refusal, they must have misapprehended what took place, for, having sent to the chief clerk, he had received a written answer saying that he expected it would have been brought before him (the Vice-Chancellor) personally, but no application had been made for that purpose. His Honour was quite sure that neither of his chief clerks had the least idea that they had a right to refuse to have a matter brought before him personally. The motion must stand over until the next seal, in order that the official liquidators might make a substantive motion.

HOME CIRCUIT.—MAIDSTONE.

The commission was opened in this town on Monday. The cause list contained 26 causes, 12 of which were to be tried by special juries.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—LINCOLN.

The commission was opened in this town on the 12th inst. The cause list contained 14 entries, 4 of which were marked for special juries.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK.

Mr. Justice Hill and Mr. Justice Keating opened the commission in this town on the 7th inst. The cause list was heavy; the West Riding list containing an entry of 38 causes, of which 16 were marked for special juries. The East and North Riding list contained an entry of 22 causes, 4 being marked for special juries.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—BLACKBURN.

Mr. Justice Blackburn opened the commission in this town on the 7th inst. The cause list contained only two causes.

STAFFORD.

The commission was opened in this town on the 11th inst. There were 24 causes entered, 9 being marked special.

SOUTH WALES CIRCUIT.—SWANSEA.

The commission was opened in this town on the 8th inst. The cause list contained an entry of 16 causes.

CROWN COURT.—(Before Mr. Justice WILLES.)

March 8.—When the grand jury were about to be discharged they handed in the following memorial:—

"We, the grand jury of the county of Dorset, desire to express to her Majesty's judges of assize our opinion that the present scale of allowances to prosecutors and witnesses is so low that in many cases a dislike to become prosecutors and a reluctance to give evidence is induced, and in many instances there is a failure of justice from parties refusing or neglecting to bring cases forward, under the apprehension of their doing so entailing the necessity of appearance at the assizes or sessions. The present scale is wholly inadequate to cover the ordinary and necessary expense of any witness at the assize town whose station is above that of the labouring class. The uniformity of allowance to all grades is improper and unfair, since it is manifest that the accommodation which that allowance would furnish is not such as clergymen and professional men and the higher class of tradesmen or their families are entitled to claim, while at the same time there are many instances among those classes where the position of the individuals renders any call for increased expenditure a serious obstacle to their coming forward to assist the public in the suppression of crime and the due punishment of offenders. The grand jury, therefore, hope that your lordships will represent this matter to the proper authorities, that their attention may be directed to such alteration as will remove the cause of complaint which now exists.

"JOHN FLOYER, Foreman of the Grand Jury."

The learned JUDGE said of course, on his part, it was not his duty to express any opinion upon the matter, of which they were much more competent to form an opinion than he was; but he would forward their statement immediately to the proper authorities, who, no doubt, would receive it with the attention to which it was entitled.

EXETER.

The commission was opened in this town on the 9th inst. by Mr. Justice Willea. There were 15 causes entered for trial.

Mr. John Luskey Coad, of Liskeard, Cornwall, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

Mr. James Radford, of Gateshead, has been appointed a perpetual commissioner for taking the acknowledgments of deeds to be executed by married women in and for the county of Durham.

Mr. Robert Lowe Grant Vassall, of Bristol, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, March 11.

THE LAW OF DIVORCE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved for a select committee to consider the law respecting the parties who are or ought to be entitled to sue in the Divorce Court in England, and in the Court of Session in Scotland for a dissolution of marriage. His lordship stated that great difficulties were experienced by Irish protestants and English residents in India in obtaining a divorce. It had been ruled that the Divorce Court in England had no jurisdiction in such cases, as those parties had not an English domicile. His lordship remarked upon the conflict of laws on the subject between England and Scotland, and the serious results produced thereby.

LORD CRANWORTH thought there would be much opposition to any interference with the marriage laws of Scotland. He saw no reason why all her Majesty's subjects should not be enabled to proceed in the present Divorce Court, and considered the jurisdiction of that Court ought to be extended.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION BILL.

This Bill passed through committee with amendments.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

The amendments to this Bill, which were merely verbal, were reported and agreed to.

Thursday, March 14.

LODGEMENTS OF APPEALS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he had to propose the repeal of the standing order of the 13th of July, 1678, the object of which was to regulate the periods during the session at which appeals might be entered, and which had been found in practice productive of great inconvenience.

LORD CHELMSFORD expressed his approval of the proposed alteration; and,

After a few words from Lord CRANWORTH, the House directed that the standing order should be vacated.

ADMIRALTY COURTS JURISDICTION BILL.

The report of amendments in this Bill were agreed to.

TRADE MARKS BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

DISGAVELLING OF LANDS.

Mr. LYON laid on the table a Bill for the voluntary disgavelling of lands, but reserved the explanation of its provisions till the second reading.

The Bill was read a first time.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.

A Bill to extend the jurisdiction and improve the practice of the High Court of Admiralty has passed the second reading in the House of Lords, and gone into committee. It contains the following provisions:—

Sect. 1. Act to be called "The Admiralty Court Act, 1861."

Sect. 2 describes the meaning of the word "Ship."

Sect. 3. Act to commence on day of 1861.

Sect. 4 relates to claims for the building, equipping, or repairing of ships.

Sect. 5 relates to claims for necessaries.

Sect. 6 relates to claims for damage to cargo imported.

Sect. 7 relates to claims for damage by any ship or barge.

Sect. 8 relates to claims for salvage of life from on board British and foreign ships or boats; extending 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 458—460.

Sect. 9 relates to claims for wages and for disbursements by master of a ship; amending 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 191.

Sect. 10 extends 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 3, in regard to mortgages.

Sect. 11 extends 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 62—65, and 514 to Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 12 extends the ninth part of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, to the Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 13. Court of Admiralty to be a court of record.

Sect. 14. Decrees and Orders of Court of Admiralty to have effect of judgments at common law. 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18. Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ss. 60—67.

Sect. 15 makes provision for claims as to goods taken in execution.

Sect. 16 extends the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 ss. 50, 51 to Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 17 extends the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 58, to Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 18 relates to admission of documents. Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 117.

Sect. 19 extends the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 17, to Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 20. Service of subpoena out of England and Wales, to be effectual.

Sect. 21 gives power to issue new writs or other process.

Sect. 22. Judge and registrar to have same power as to arbitration as judges and masters at common law.

Sect. 23 extends 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 15, to registrar of Court of Admiralty.

Sect. 24. Registrar may exercise same power as surrogate and deputy or assistant registrar may exercise same power as registrar.

Sect. 25. False oath or affirmation to be perjury.

Sect. 26. Barrister, attorney, &c., may be appointed registrar and deputy or assistant registrar.

Sect. 27. Barrister, attorney, &c., may be appointed examiner of the court.

Sect. 28. Stamp duty not to be payable on second admission of proctor or solicitor.

Sect. 29. Proctor may act as agent of solicitors; 55 Geo. 3, c. 160.

Sect. 30. 2 Hen. 4, c. 11, repealed.

Sect. 31. Power of appeal given in interlocutory matters.

Sect. 32. No appeal to be allowed except upon a question of law. [This clause will be withdrawn in committee.]

Sect. 33. Jurisdiction of the Court may be by proceedings in rem or in personam.

TRADE MARKS.

A Bill to amend the law relating to the fraudulent marking of merchandise has passed the House of Lords with slight amendment. It contains the following provisions:—

Sect. 1. Interpretation: "person;" "trade mark;"

Sect. 2. Any person forging or imitating a trade mark, with intent to defraud, to be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sect. 3. Any person selling, &c., with forged trade mark, with intent to defraud, to be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sect. 4. Describing marks as trade marks to be sufficient for purposes of indictment.

Sect. 5. Marking goods, &c., with false indication of quantity, &c. with intent to defraud, to be a misdemeanour.

Sect. 6. Any person selling, &c., with false indication of quantity, &c., with intent to defraud, to be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Sect. 7. Forging, imitating, or falsely applying the names and marks of artists, with intent to defraud, to be a misdemeanour.

Sect. 8. Intent to defraud, &c., any particular person need not be alleged or proved.

Sect. 9. Punishment for misdemeanour under this Act to be by imprisonment for two years, with or without hard labour, or by fine.

Sect. 10. Conviction not to affect civil remedy, either at law or in equity.

EQUITY.

EFFECT OF DEATH, BY OWN HAND, ON LIFE ASSURANCE.

Horn v. The Anglo Australian Assurance Company.

V. C. W., 9 W. R. 359.

In this case a life policy had been effected containing no provision as to the death of the assured by his own hand. The assured afterwards destroyed himself; and a coroner's jury found that he had done so while in a state of mental derangement. It was held by Vice Chancellor Wood that the representatives of the deceased were entitled to recover on the policy. There was another policy on the same life containing a proviso that in case the assured should die "by his own hands" within three years from the date of the assurance the policy should be void. The death occurred in the fourth year; and thus no question arose upon this proviso. If the death had happened a year earlier there seems no doubt that the policy would have become void. The phrase "die by his own hands" may perhaps be thought to be equivalent to "commit suicide," and yet it has probably been adopted in life policies in order to avoid the question which arose in the case of Clift v. Schwabe, 3 C. B. 437. In that case the proviso contained the words "commit suicide," and in an action on the policy, the judge directed the jury that in order to find for the defendants, they must be satisfied that the deceased died by his own voluntary act, being then able to distinguish between right and wrong, and to appreciate the nature and quality of the act that he was then doing, so as to be a responsible moral agent. The defendants excepted to this direction, and after argument before seven judges in the Exchequer Chamber, it was held by a majority of the Court to be erroneous, for that the terms of the condition included all acts of voluntary self-destruction, and, therefore, it was immaterial whether, at the time he killed himself, the deceased was a responsible moral agent. The opinion that the words "commit suicide" pointed to a legal crime was, however, maintained by two out of the seven judges as well as by the judge who tried the case. The effect of the words "die by his own hands" had been tested in the previous case of Borradaile v. Hunter (5 M. & G. 639), where it was held that these words included all acts of voluntary self-destruction and were not to be limited to acts of felonious suicide. This decision was arrived at against the authority of Chief Justice Tindal, who was of opinion that "a felonious killing of himself," and no other, was intended to be excepted from the policy.

It thus appears that some of the judges have been inclined to restrict both the words "commit suicide," and also those "die by his own hands," to the case of felonious suicide; but that this inclination has been overruled. We apprehend that as against the representatives of the assured a policy would become void upon felonious suicide without any proviso at all, and, therefore, unless such a clause were taken to provide for something beyond felonious suicide it would amount to nothing. In The Amicable Society v. Bolland (2 Dow. & Cl. 1), it was decided that in the absence of any proviso a policy on the life of the forger Fauntleroy, which had become vested in his assignees in bankruptcy, was by necessary inference vacated when the assured had died by the hand of justice. This decision of the House of Lords was rested on the ground that by the general policy of the law the assurance became void in consequence of the death of the assured being occasioned by his own criminal act. The Lord Chancellor said that an express assurance against the event of death by the hand of justice would undoubtedly be void, and an assurance which, by force of circumstances, amounted to the same thing, must be void also. It is to be observed that the reasoning in this case is equally or even more applicable to that of felonious suicide, where the death of the assured is occasioned by his own criminal act in a more direct sense than where the hangman interferes. Accordingly, in the case before us, Vice Chancellor Wood appears to admit that a policy would be avoided by the act of a felo de se. But in that case the deceased was found by a jury to have been of unsound mind, and, therefore, he had committed no legal offence. "There was no principle of public policy which prevented an assurance against insanity and its consequences." It should be observed that assurance offices may and often do bind themselves to pay the sum assured or part of it to an assignee for value, notwithstanding the suicide of the assured. The legality of such a contract was expressly declared by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Moore v. Woolsey (4 Ell. & Bl. 243). In answer to the argument that policies so framed tended to encourage suicide, Lord Campbell remarked that the practice of granting beneficial leases for lives might also be said to tend to encourage murder by the lessor.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

ALLEGED DIFFERENCE IN RULE AS TO TACKING MORTGAGES ON FORECLOSURE AND ON REDEMPTION.

Selby v. Pomfret, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 398.

Unless this case be successfully appealed from, it may be considered as finally setting at rest the question whether there is any difference in the mortgagee's right to tack according as he seeks to foreclose, or the mortgagor seeks to redeem, the mortgages. The question is usually stated in these terms, but it was put much better by Sir J. L. Knight Bruce in a case in bankruptcy to which we shall presently refer, where he said that the substance of the objection to the mortgagee's claim was that he could only tack when he was passive, and not when he was active. This statement of the supposed rule makes it wide enough to embrace such a case as that now before us, in which there was no foreclosure, but an exercise of the mortgagee's power of sale.

The rule is stated as an existing one in "Jarman's Conveyancing," 3rd ed. vol. 5, p. 438, the date of this volume being 1839; and it is added on the authority of Ex parte Bignold, Re Newton, 2 Dea. 66, that a mortgagee applying for a sale in bankruptcy of distinct estates mortgaged to him for distinct debts, cannot have the surplus of one estate applied to make good the deficiency of another. This was a decision of the Court of Review in Bankruptcy given in 1836. The same general rule is also stated in the text of "Powell on Mortgages;" but in a note to the 6th edition by Coventry, vol. 2, p. 1019, the existence of the supposed distinction is controverted. These seem to have been the principal authorities in support of the notion which has been partially entertained down to recent times. They were followed by Sir James Wigram in Holmes v. Turner, 7 Hare 367 n., a case which occurred in 1843; and by Sir George Turner in Sneathman v. Bray, 15 Jur. 1051, who treated the last cited case as a decisive authority upon the question. This was in 1851.

On the other hand, we find in 1843, a decision of Sir J. L. Knight Bruce in Bankruptcy in the case of Ex parte Berridge, Re Loosemore, 3 M. D. & De. G. 464. The petitioners in that case claimed to be equitable mortgagees of one freehold estate of the bankrupt, and legal mortgagees of another; and they asked for a sale of the premises comprised in both mortgages, and for the application of the proceeds as one fund in payment of both debts. It will be observed that the petitioners had a right to a conveyance of the legal estate in the property in which they had an equitable estate, and they had a right to bring an ejectment in respect of the property in which they already had the legal estate. They might, therefore, obtain possession of the latter estate; and if they did so, and if the equity of redemption was of any value, it would be the duty of the assignees to take proceedings to redeem that estate, that is, to place themselves in such a position that the petitioners would become entitled to be redeemed as to the whole amount of both their debts. Upon the one security the mortgagees must have taken some active step in equity, while on the other they need only proceed at law in order to shift the onus of the initiative in equity upon the assignees. It would seem from this example that the application of the supposed rule to a particular case would be liable to depend on accidental circumstances, so that different cases would be decided differently without any substantial reason for the difference. This observation is suggested by the judgment of Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, and no doubt it was present to his mind, but he did not found his decision on it. As the petitioners submitted, and the assignees were subject, to his jurisdiction, he took the course which seemed most for the benefit of the estate; and instead of leaving the petitioners to enforce their legal right on the one mortgage, and thus to compel the assignees to redeem both mortgages, he ordered redemption of both in the first instance. This case, therefore, is not a conclusive authority against the existence of the alleged distinction, but it shows very strongly that a rule founded on it is incapable of general practical application.

We come now to the case of Watts v. Symes, 1 D. M. & G. 244; in which these conflicting views were brought in the year 1851 under the cognizance of superior authority. In that case there was an assignment by way of mortgage to the plaintiff of a reversionary interest in personality. The form of this assignment was upon trust for sale and for payment of the residue to the mortgagor after satisfying the mortgage money and interest. When this mortgage was made to the plaintiff he was already mortgagee of other property which the same mortgagor had conveyed to him to secure another debt. The plaintiff now sought to foreclose the mortgagor in default of payment of all that was due on both of his securities. Vice-Chancellor Shadwell had decided against this claim; but on appeal to the Lords Justices that view was adopted for which one of them (Sir J. L. Knight Bruce) had indicated a preference, as we have seen above. Lord Cranworth said, "I thought it quite settled that, whether the suit was for foreclosure or redemption, the mortgagee was equally entitled to say to the mortgagor, you must redeem entirely or not at all." He added, in answer to the respondent's argument, that the form of the security in that case made no difference, and of course the nature of the property on which the security was taken was equally immaterial.

In Selby v. Pomsfret, the question arose between a mortgagee and the assignees of the mortgagor who had become bankrupt. The mortgagee held securities upon two different estates, one of which had been sold for more, and the other for less, than the amount secured upon it. The mortgagee, of course, claimed to tack, while the assignees insisted that each property ought only to bear the amount charged upon it, according to the above-stated decision of the Court of Review in Bankruptcy in Ex parte Bignold. The bill was by the assignees, but, as the mortgagee had exercised his power of sale, we apprehend, nevertheless, that it was a case in which he had been "active;" and, therefore, according to the supposed rule he ought not to have been allowed to tack. However, Vice-Chancellor Wood considered that, after the case of Watts v. Symes, all further doubt was at an end, and accordingly he dismissed the bill. It is to be observed that the mortgagee got the more productive of the two securities into his hands by assignment from the original mortgagee thereof after the bankruptcy of the mortgagor. The Vice-Chancellor disposed of the plaintiffs' argument founded upon this circumstance by saying that "any one might seize the plank."

COMMON LAW.

INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS AND OF PROPERTY—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 6, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 50 & 58.

Daniel v. Bond, C. P., 9 W. R. 313; Bennett v. Griffiths, Q. B., 9 W. R. 332.

There are two cases upon the law of inspection as remodelled by recent Acts and decisions. The rules as to inspection at common law were singularly narrow and insufficient for the ease of litigant parties. The power of compelling the opposite party to allow the other to inspect and copy, if he pleased, any document relating to the matter in difference, was indeed exercised by the Courts in virtue of an authority which they alleged to be inherent to their constitution, but it was not exerted except under stringent limitations. These were chiefly, 1. That the order for inspection would only be made between the parties to the action. 2. That the applicant must be, in fact or interest, a party to the instrument; and, 3. That the adverse party must be under a trust, express or implied, to produce the document when necessary. These inconvenient restrictions were the occasion of the provision on this subject which was contained in the Evidence Amendment Act, 1851, from which, however, the courts deduced certain rules of a disabling character—namely, that inspection would only be ordered under it.—1. Where there was some legal proceeding pending. 2. Where the document related to such proceeding and was in the custody or control of the adverse party; and 3. Where the applicant would have been able before the Act of 1851 to have obtained relief in equity by a bill of discovery (see Hunt v. Hewitt, 7 Exch. 236). Since this provision, however, the law as to inspection, generally, has been again improved by the Legislature in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854; which (in addition to a certain provision with regard to discovery, of which we will speak more presently), gave power to the courts of law to order an inspection of real or personal property, a jurisdiction which had previously belonged only to the Court of Chancery.

Such being the course of legislation on this subject, we may now observe with respect to the two cases above named, that the first was an application for a rule requiring the defendant to grant the plaintiff leave to "inspect" certain documents in the possession of the defendant, and which were required as evidence to support the plaintiff's case. It appears by the report that the application was made under the 50th section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854; but it is apprehended that it was rather under the Evidence Amendment Act, 1851 (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99). For by the 6th section of that Act the opposite party in an action may be compelled by rule or order to allow the other party to the proceedings to inspect documents in the custody or under the control of such opposite party relating to the action; while the object and effect of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 50, is rather to compel the opposite party to discover to the party making the application what documents, &c., relating to the matter in dispute may be in his possession and power. In the present case there seems to have been no necessity for any discovery, as the documents in question were known to the party making the application, and all he required was leave and opportunity to inspect them; and his application was granted by the Court, who took occasion to remark that they might and would compel all documents which have either a direct or proximate bearing upon a cause to be tried, to be produced when called for, if in the power of the adverse party.

The other case (Bennett v. Griffiths) affords a useful reading upon the other provision in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, bearing upon the subject of inspection—namely, the 58th—which authorises a rule or order for an inspection—either by the applicant (being one of the parties to an action), or by the jury or by his witnesses—of any real or personal property, the inspection of which may be material to the proper determination of the question in dispute; and the provision concludes with the following words, upon the proper scope of which the case substantially turned; "and it shall be lawful for the court or judge, if they or he think fit, to make such rule or orders upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as such court or judge may direct." Now it is obvious that there may often happen cases in which it will be of no avail to order an inspection unless there be engrafted therein an order or authority to do what may be required to render inspection possible; and the question in Bennett v. Griffiths (where this difficulty actually arose) was whether an order framed upon this principle, is within the meaning of sect. 58.

As to the circumstances of the particular case, they may be very briefly dismissed, as they do not affect the principle of construction. It is sufficient to say that the order in question was made in an action for taking coal from the plaintiff's mine (the plaintiff and defendant being the owners of adjacent mines) and that it was to the effect that the plaintiff might inspect the defendant's mine, and for that purpose make a hole through a fence which obstructed the entrance to the mine.

It was mentioned above that this jurisdiction, prior to the year 1854, belonged exclusively to the courts of equity. In those courts wherever the inspection decreed has been obstructed, the removal of the obstruction has been ordered (see The Earl of Lonsdale v. Curwen, and Walker v. Fletcher, cited in the notes 3 Bligh. O.S., 153, 168). And in the present case, the Court of Queen's Bench formally assumed a jurisdiction equally large—not (as they observed) that the jurisdiction given to the courts of law must of necessity be regulated by that exercised in the courts of equity—but because the existence of the practice in those courts of removing obstructions to an inspection ordered, was a cogent argument in favour of such a jurisdiction being auxiliary also to that power of compelling an inspection, which the legislature had now given to the courts of law.

LAW EXAMINATIONS.

I have received a circular requesting my opinion, as a member of the Incorporated Law Society, upon the report of the committee appointed to consider the examinations in general knowledge and intermediate examinations in legal knowledge directed by the Attorneys' Act of last session. Upon the general scope of that report I have no remark to make, except to express my admiration of the spirit in which the committee have sought to carry out the intentions of the Legislature. There is, however, one additional subject of examination which I wish to submit to the Council as of the highest importance; so important, in truth, that I would respectfully urge that it be added to Part I of the preliminary examination, or even required from all candidates (including those who have obtained a degree or passed an examination other than that by the special examiners,) at the intermediate legal examination. I allude to the principles of social economy. In conducting the education of his son, a parent should not only seek to obtain for him such instruction as will lead to the general cultivation of his faculties, and draw out his intelligence into activity, but should also consider if there be any subject to which, having regard to his future career, special prominence should be given. If the occupation for which he is destined be that of an engineer, mathematics will probably form a chief part of his early studies. If he be intended for a merchant, foreign languages will be carefully attended to. If for a farmer, then chemistry will occupy the foremost place. So, with the view of directing early studies, the preliminary examinations of youths about to enter the service of the State are specially directed to those subjects which are most important in reference to the particular branch to which they may be seeking admission. I am glad to see that the committee have, to some extent at least, recognized these principles by the insertion of book-keeping in the list of indispensable subjects in the preliminary examination. But to require that the studies of a boy about to enter into articles should include book-keeping, while the principles of social economy are not mentioned, is as if in educating him to become a farmer one should have him carefully taught how to keep a complete set of farming books, but leave him wholly ignorant of the chemical constituents of the ground which he is learning to till. Universally important as is an early grounding in the principles which govern social life, and by which every person, of whatever occupation, should regulate his conduct, to the lawyer, who has to guide himself and his clients also, it is of far more vital consequence. In the present day, the solicitor has become, much more than formerly, the confidential friend and adviser of his clients in their more important transactions and negotiations. His occupation is not merely the prosecution or defence of their actions or suits, the sale of their estates, or the carrying into effect their agreements. He is consulted as to the arrangements to be made by will or otherwise in providing for their families. If a client contemplates entering into a partnership or making any other large or unusual investment of his capital, he will ask his lawyer's advice before concluding the negotiation; and a solicitor whose mind has been well trained in the principles which regulate social relations, will often be able, by his sound and practised judgment, to avert loss and disaster. Again, the boards of most public companies are regularly attended by their solicitors; and the advice of the latter is asked upon every important transaction, whether strictly within the province of a legal adviser or no. I need hardly say more upon the importance to lawyers of a sound education in the principles of social economy. But it is possible that objections may be urged to my proposal, such as that boyhood is too early in life for such a study to be profitably pursued, or that knowledge of the social relations is improving in this country, and may be left to itself for further development. I wish I could believe that social knowledge is really in a satisfactory state; but it is my conviction that no branch of education is less attended to and yet of more vital importance to all classes. The operation of industry, skill, and economy upon the well being of society; the principles which regulate the division of labour and the exchange of different classes of commodities; the relation to each other of rent, interest, and profits; and, above all, the laws which govern the use of credit, the disregard of which inevitably produces ruin and misery, are subjects upon which it is of the deepest importance that clear notions should be widely diffused. Yet there are very few of our profession who understand them. And in answer to the objection, that this study cannot be profitably pursued in youth, and, therefore, should not be added to a preliminary examination, I would urge that a general knowledge of the principles of social economy is peculiarly required as an introduction to the more minute study of the rules of law by which the action of those principles is protected, and their free play secured. It will be admitted, too, that the groundwork of any science is more easily inculcated in youth than in later life, and that truths which have been thoroughly acquired in boyhood rarely fail to produce a lasting and beneficial effect on the future career. Moreover, such instruction imparts a method and arrangement, nay, even an interest, to the subsequent legal studies which enable a far greater benefit to be derived from the latter. The importance of this branch of education, not for lawyers alone, but for all classes, is now beginning to be more widely felt. Professorships of this subject have been founded at King's College and University College. A class of economic science has been recently established in University College School, under the able conduct of Mr. W. A. Shields, in which the text-book adopted is a valuable little treatise called "Lessons on the Phenomena of Industrial Life," edited by the Dean of Hereford. The Committee of Privy Council on Education have also turned their attention to it, and, under their express authority, a course of lectures on the subject was last year delivered by Mr. W. Ellis, at the South Kensington Museum. An association of schoolmasters has been recently formed in London, called the Schoolmasters Social Science Association, of which the first and principal object, as stated in their rules, is

"The study of Social Science and how to teach it, as a means of raising the intellectual and professional status of teachers, of rendering them more efficient in the teaching and the training of the young, and, thereby, of more beneficially influencing society."

And this branch of education has even been extended to the schools for the poorer classes. It now forms part of the system of instruction in many of the schools under the superintendence of the National, the British and Foreign, and other school societies of the valuable class of schools known as the Birkbeck schools and others. The boys who receive that education are mostly under the age of fifteen; yet I do not think that any one who has observed the practical working of the schools will hesitate to bear witness to the great value of the instruction conveyed.

I appeal, then, to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society not to let pass the present opportunity of introducing this subject into the course of studies of the actual or intending law student. It is not necessary to impose any other than an elementary examination; in fact, it would be unadvisable to do so. But, if the attention of parents be directed to the importance of a knowledge of the principles of social economy, and if some preliminary study of that subject be required to precede or form part of a solicitor's education, a benefit of the highest value will have been conferred on the legal profession, and, through it, on the whole community.

EDMD. K. BLYTH.

Permit me to make a few observations upon one of the recommendations of the committee of the Incorporated Law Society on examinations in general knowledge to be instituted under the Attorneys' Act, 1860, ss. 5, 8.

This recommendation is shortly: that every person who shall have passed the senior middle class examination established by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge may be articulated for the term of four years.

I was London secretary for the Cambridge middle class examinations in 1858, and am a member of the London committee for regulating these examinations: I have thus acquired some knowledge of their nature, of the standards of excellence adopted in them, and of the class of boys who undergo them. This knowledge has convinced me that the adoption of the above recommendation of the committee will be unwise, and detrimental to the interests of our profession. In the hope that the council will pause before they carry this recommendation into effect, I submit the following remarks to their consideration.

1. It is the duty of the council and the examiners to take care that all gentlemen, to whom they give a certificate of fitness to enter our profession, be qualified to practise without injury to their clients.

2. The experience of our examiners and of nearly all practitioners who have taken young men into their offices immediately after their examination, teaches that the general period of five years is not a day too long for the acquisition of the necessary legal knowledge and practical experience. Indeed, many young men after their term of service go for a few months to a conveyancer's chambers before they feel themselves competent to undertake the active duties of their profession.

3. Therefore it is not right to shorten this term of service in the case of any gentlemen unless they possess some peculiar qualification either of age or knowledge which compensates for the loss of service.

4. Graduates of the universities are believed to possess such a qualification (a) in their greater age; (b) in their superior education; (c) in the knowledge of men and manners which they have acquired at college; and (d) in some cases in superior station in life.

5. But even a well-read graduate must be articled in an office presenting unusual facilities for learning his profession, and must work with rare diligence all his time, to be at the end of it qualified to practise on his own account.

6. It is now proposed to take off one year's service in the case of young gentlemen who have passed the Oxford or Cambridge senior middle class examination. Therefore, before this is done it should be proved to demonstration that they who have passed these examinations are much better prepared for service under articles than the young gentlemen who have hitherto been articled for 5 years; and this superiority should arise from one or more of the four heads mentioned in paragraph 4.

7. Let us take them in order.

(a) Age. A boy must not be more than 18 at the time of passing the examination, he may be 15, 16, or 17: clearly, then, no superior qualification arises from this source.

(b) Superior education. I am able to state from my own knowledge of these examinations that the standard for a pass is by no means high, and I should be most sorry to pay the members of our profession generally (and still less the members of the council) so bad a compliment as to admit for an instant that nearly all of them could not have passed these examinations with ease before they were articled.

The candidates are allowed to select their own subjects (with but slight exceptions), so as to pass upon a knowledge of chemistry and drawing.

(c) No argument is required to shew that passing these examinations neither gives nor proves any acquaintance with the world. In fact, the point next considered will shew that these boys have this qualification in a less degree than they who now form the staple of our articled clerks.

(d) These are emphatically "middle-class examinations." The candidates come with few exceptions from middle-class schools. The great public schools will not leave their usual modes of education for the sake of their few boys who might wish to undergo these examinations; consequently, while I must speak in the highest terms of the respectability and good behaviour of the candidates, I am bound to say that few are sons of gentlemen, and very few indeed, if any, are of the higher classes. Thus, so far from the 4th ground of superiority existing in this case, the effect of the change will be to tempt into the profession young men of a lower class than heretofore by giving them a great privilege on easy terms.

At present our profession deservedly ranks amongst the "liberal professions," and its members are for the most part "gentlemen" by birth, breeding, and education, as well as by law. But every admission of an articled clerk of a lower grade will tend to keep out one of the higher classes, and I regret to see a tendency in recent legislation to this lamentable result.

Lastly, I must observe that these examinations have not yet been so long established as to form with propriety the basis for a change in our regulations. This is only their fourth year, and many thoughtful men in each university (including some of their original promoters) and many schoolmasters of note throughout the country entertain grave doubts as to the effects of these examinations and the wisdom of continuing them. At any rate, many changes must be made in their nature, and it will be years before their standards of knowledge are fixed. When they are it will be time enough (if ever) to give privileges to the boys who attain unto them.

For these reasons, as I desire neither to lower my profession nor to cast a slur upon its existing members by giving out to the world that we consider that we shall raise the class from which they spring by tempting into it boys whose sole merit is that they have passed the middle class examinations, I respectfully but earnestly implore the council to disregard this recommendation of their committee; and I hope that the judges will make no order for the adoption of so objectionable a proposal.

POLICE CONSTABLES AS ADVOCATES.

The magistrates at a petty session lately held at Holmfirth, allowed a superintendent of police to act as an advocate and examine and cross-examine witnesses on the hearing of an information laid by a subordinate constable against some parties for an assault committed upon him whilst in the execution of his duty, although a barrister who attended for the defendants protested against it. Do you consider such practice ought to be submitted to? Is it not a violation of the law, and calculated to lower the position of the legal profession? The clerk to the magistrates is a solicitor, and he acquiesced in the proceeding.

SCRUTATOR.

[We believe that even in the metropolitan police courts, policemen are much employed in discharging the proper functions of lawyers. The Metropolitan Board of Works employs superintendents of police, not only to "get up" cases against owners and occupiers of unsafe buildings, and to serve the statutory notices, &c., but even to conduct the cases before the magistrate. We have heard some curious anecdotes touching the opening speeches of these would-be advocates. The subject to which "Scrutator" calls attention is one of considerable importance, and ought not to be overlooked. Nothing can be more absurd, or more damaging to the administration of justice, than thus to assign to uneducated policemen duties which properly belong to professional men. ED. S.J.]

NEW LAW COURTS AND OFFICES.

Sir,—On reading your kindly criticism, I was fain to lay down my arms at once and to surrender at discretion, fairly overcome by the generosity of my friendly foe; for in spite of some uncomfortable thoughts upon the fate of good Mrs. Bond's ducks, and an uneasy memory touching the victims of that most joyous and affectionate of executioners, master Petit André, I had an honest faith in your good dispositions towards me which I still retain and am duly thankful for.

But permit me to disclaim the merit you impute to me. My pamphlet on the Ecclesiastical Courts was nothing more than the putting in form of the reasonings of a committee, of which, though composed of many able men, Mr. Field, that most original, energetic, and rapid of the law reforming intellects of the present day, was the life and soul. The immediate result, however, was no more than to throw out an obnoxious Bill of Sir John Nicholl's. But in the present cause, the Courts Removal, I claim to have struck the first blow in a pamphlet in 1840, thereby originating Serjeant Wilde's committee of that year, the evidence before which decided the principle of the removal finally and beyond dispute. It was before that committee that the Law Society's council and Sir C. Barry declared Lincoln's-inn-fields to be the best site. The former alone withdrew from that opinion, and it is for my greater consistency that you, Mr. Editor, deem me to be a monomaniac.

Now, it is the character of a mind so afflicted to leave out of sight all large considerations and to fix its enamoured view on one point of a matter only, nay upon a fractional part of a point; and by this test I am willing to inquire whether you or I deserve that appellation.

I will enumerate, then, the weighty considerations which you treat with silence, or deem "hardly worthy of mention":—

1. You are silent upon the comparison, in regard to public health, between the diffusion under the Fields' plan of the great and only requisites, fresh air, pure water, and free sewerage over an area of fifteen acres; and the less efficient amelioration under the Strand scheme of only six acres.

2. Upon the gardens to be opened to the public, where Lord Shaftesbury thinks it no trivial matter that children "may handle their hoops," whilst the mothers enjoy the summer shade of the trees, pleasures now denied to them, and otherwise not to be obtained, unless by indemnifying the freeholders for the large cost of originally forming and since maintaining the present garden.

3. Upon the unspeakable value of the new streets, both as air-channels and traffic-thoroughfares.

4. You deem "hardly worth mentioning" the "noble position" for the new building; and the great opportunity that now occurs of adding to the architectural character of the metropolis.

5. The same of the "facility of access;" though the Fields' plan affords this to carriages and foot passengers in the utmost perfection; and the Strand site precludes it to both.

6. The same, I presume, (under your words "and the like") of all other the greater comforts and advantages attaching to courts in a broad and open space, and not girdled and hemmed in by public thoroughfares.

7. Though appreciating, as a great merit, the quietude of the Fields, you doubt the power to preserve it, thinking that improved accesses may invite the general traffic. But when the new parallel streets outside, west and south, made partly for the very diversion of this traffic afford an equally convenient course, there will be no need that any through traffic should invade the quiet of the courts; two or more gates may legitimately defend the exposed points, and a fine, if needful, may deter the wanton breach of a public regulation. Here, then, the quietude you feel important may be attained; in the Strand, not; for your explanation of the intended plan exhibits all the outside rooms on three fronts as assailed by noise. Many of these will be audience chambers; and though I deny not but that the officers and quasi-judges occupying them may in time, like the miller, become patient of the disturbance, they will suffer unconsciously from an attrition and fretting of their nerves, very mischievous in the long run to health of mind and body; whilst the attending public, not similarly enured, must undergo the annoyance to the end of time in full force.

8. You seem to me sensible, Mr. Editor, of the inadequacy of the Strand site to the extension of the principle of concentration in after times to future legal structures; and not insensible, I would infer, to the singular capability of Lincoln's-inn-fields to become the grand centre of the public edifices of the law. To escape from this fatal defect in the Strand site, an ingenuity is exerted which cannot be too much admired. I have, however, read something like it in the "Marine Zoology" of Mr. Gosse, or in Professor Kingsley's "Glaucus." In consequence of the extreme awkwardness of the ground, the mother-court-building is in the progression of time to be surrounded by a progeny of affiliated offsets, "protruded," as you express it, from her own body, and united in a "congeries" by umbilical cords, thus overgrowing the neighbourhood of Temple-bar; whilst beneath these monster Siamese cords, which it seems may be multiplied at discretion, carts and carriages will be seen to move at ease. The whole will present the appearance of some great zoophyte, and will highly gratify the then representatives of Mr. Ruskin's views by bringing natural history into the service of architecture. Doubtless the House of Commons will augur well of a site which so taxes the wit of its defenders to make it answer its desired end.

The consideration of an undue economy, I disclaim. I have ever said the best site must be had at whatever cost. Parsimony ill becomes a great nation. Still, I have a satisfaction in hearing that the Rolls' estate will exempt the Fields' plan from the purchase of a site for the Wills Depository, making it the cheaper scheme altogether by a quarter of a million, or, in your mode of computation, by £8,000 a year. I do not enter into the device of a gas-lit tunnel; I apprehend a close van could conveniently carry the records to their final resting place, and the distance from the Fields' Courts to the Rolls is a mere step.

I have tried to show that the considerations which you disregard or put aside are such as to common apprehensions deserve a first place; and, regarded from the point of view you claim as your own, they include every element of adaptation to the specific end, except indeed a fractional consideration of small amount.

For on what do you rest the merit of your site? On the general convenience of professional men? Not so, but on a minute fraction of this only. Lincoln's-inn and Gray's-inn and their neighbourhoods lie as well or better for Lincoln's-inn-fields, and there are few solicitors in the Temple. Hence, you rightly and necessarily rest your whole case on the convenience of the Temple barrister alone. You insist that he who hitherto has been subject to the distance of Westminster "must reach the courts without check or stoppage in a minute or two, robed, from the Temple." The viaduct we propose from the Temple to Lincoln's-inn would enable him to do this in just double the number of minutes which the Strand courts would take; if two, then four, or more probably three and six; and thus the difference is surely trivial, and will be inappreciable. The barrister need not be all day on the move to and fro between chambers and the courts, and the extra minutes will be of no account. If circumstances were equal, it were better to save him even these; but for this insignificant fraction of a fractional convenience to call upon us to submit to noisy, inaccessible, and ill-circumstanced courts (qualities made palpable by the forced ingenuity they evoke) when courts perfect in every attribute are within our power, and to a sacrifice of all architectural and metropolitan considerations, is to my mind a miscalculation, an extravagance, and a monomania.

Should the article, to which I thus ask your leave to reply, have had its origin with the Law Society, as by its exact information it might seem to have done, to the society let this answer be addressed; and whilst I again thank the writer for his kindly tone towards myself, I trust I have here said nothing to forfeit his friendly dispositions.—Your obedient servant, Wolverley, 11th March.

PROMOTION AT THE BAR.

Sir,—I write to inform you that on Saturday a petition to the Crown praying inquiry into the effect of the present system of promotion at the Bar, was left at the Home-Office for presentation.

The petition alleges in effect that the exercise of the prerogative in appointing Queen's Counsel is of no real service to the Crown, is injurious to the suitor, and operates with much injustice to other barristers.

It is presented on public grounds only.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

EDWARD WEBSTER.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

At a recent meeting of this society, Mr. J. PITT TAYLOR read the following paper "On the Expediency of passing an Act to permit Defendants in Criminal Courts, and their Wives or Husbands, to testify on Oath."

The rules of law which preclude a man, when charged with the commission of a crime, from giving his own testimony on oath, or from calling his wife as a witness, have, in consequence of two remarkable trials, been recently much canvassed by the public. Both questions are difficult and interesting; and as they obviously have an important bearing on the due administration of justice, a discussion on their merits by the members of the Law Amendment Society cannot fail to be productive of great advantage. With the view of raising this discussion, and, if possible, of leading the society to what I conceive to be a right conclusion, I have prepared a summary of the arguments which, after much thought, have convinced me that the existing law on both points is unsound in principle and injurious in practice.

And first, as to the rule which rejects the sworn testimony of defendants in criminal courts. In discussing this rule, as in discussing every subject connected with the laws of evidence, we must keep steadfastly in mind the two following legal axioms:—1st, in all judicial investigations the object to be attained is the discovery of truth, and no species of evidence ought to be excluded which can materially aid in that discovery; 2nd, the rules of evidence ought, so far as it is practicable, to be the same in civil and in criminal proceedings.

Now, since the law under discussion is in direct conflict with both these axioms, the burden of proof is shifted on its supporters, who can hardly rest satisfied with the presumption, which usually favours existing institutions, but who must be prepared to show that the continuance of what is confessedly an exceptional state of the law is founded on sound reasons. Then, what are the reasons which justify this law? As far as I can ascertain, they seem to range under one or other of the following heads. It is contended, first, that the admission of the testimony of defendants in criminal trials would mislead juries; next, that it would increase the crime of perjury; and, lastly, that it would expose the accused to unfair and oppressive examination. To refute the first reason is no difficult matter. It has been urged without success on every occasion when the strict rule of the common law, rejecting the testimony of interested witnesses, has been relaxed; and it is based on an assumption of incapacity on the part of juries, which is proved by daily experience to be wholly unfounded. In investigating questions of fact, men are far more likely to err by being forced to grope their way to a conclusion in the twilight or in the dark, than by having their mental vision dazzled by excess of light. Moreover, as the motive of a prisoner to deceive is at least as obvious as it is strong, any statement he might make would be received with suspicion, and be weighed with more than ordinary care.

The objection that perjury would become more prevalent, if parties accused of crimes were allowed to be sworn, is scarcely less futile than the one just answered. This was the grand argument put forward in 1851, when the Bill for admitting the testimony of parties to civil suits was before Parliament. It inherent weakness was then exposed by the promoters of that measure, and the Legislature, putting a proper estimate on its value, set it at naught. The Act was passed, and after having been nine years in operation, it is now admitted by universal consent to have worked a most salutary change. Some plaintiffs and defendants have of course committed perjury, and possibly that crime may have increased in a slight degree; but assuming such to be the case, the evil arising from the increase cannot be regarded as very alarming, since only thirty-five persons were convicted of perjury last year, and it really sinks into insignificance when contrasted with the benefits that have resulted to the cause of truth and justice, from enabling juries to hear the statements of those who were best acquainted with the facts in dispute. I do not contend that a defendant in a civil action is as strongly tempted as a person charged with crime to commit perjury; for as a man will make greater efforts to preserve his life, his liberty, or even his character, than his property, I admit that a law which would allow criminals to give evidence on oath in their own favour, would have a greater tendency than the Act of 1851 had to increase the crime of perjury. Still, I cannot discover on what sound principle of jurisprudence an innocent man can be deprived of the natural right of asserting his innocence in the most solemn manner, merely because a guilty man may be induced to tell a falsehood on oath. To reject the use of a valuable instrument simply in consequence of its possible abuse is scarcely in accordance with real philosophy. Moreover, in considering this question, we must remember that municipal law has to deal with perjury, not as a sin, but as a crime; not as an offence against the Majesty of the Allwise, but as an offence against society. We punish perjury, not as the avengers of the Deity, but because we know that it may afford the means of defeating justice, of wrongly benefiting some individuals and injuring others. These are the practical evils against which we have to guard; and if perjury were never successful, the perjurer, so far as human laws and interests are concerned, might remain unpunished, and be left to rank with the fool who said in his heart There was no God. Then, if this be so, we have no cause for alarm, even though a few criminals should be tempted to perjure themselves. False statements coming from so questionable a source would have little chance, as I have before shown, of imposing on the intelligence of juries, and, when sifted by means of cross-examination, they would almost inevitably be detected. In fact, the only effect of examining a guilty man would, in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred, be to render his guilt more transparently clear, and thus to relieve the jury from all anxiety respecting the justice of their verdict.

I pass on now to the third objection which is urged against the proposed change in the law, namely, that which rests on the assumption that defendants would be exposed to unfair and oppressive examination. It is said that if we once allow a criminal to give evidence in his own behalf, we shall put him to moral torture, we shall drive him to tell lies in his own defence, we shall exasperate the severity of our penal law, we shall sanction a species of compulsory self-crimination, and we shall adopt, what has been denounced as "the atrocious cruelty of the French system." (See per Lord Campbell and Lord Chelmsford, Hans. Parl. Deb., 3rd ser. vol. clii. pp. 762—765.) I confess that, to my mind, these conclusions do not seem to be very logically drawn. If it were proposed to extend to our criminal courts in its entirety the Act of 1851, and to render the accused not only competent to testify on his own behalf, but compellable to give evidence against himself, some of the assertions just cited would be entitled to consideration. But this is not the system which is sought to be adopted, nor anything like the system. The change which it is proposed to introduce is, that—instead of a defendant asserting his innocence as at present, and making his statement, calling God to witness that it is true, and hoping that he may die on the spot if it is false, in which case no questions are asked on cross-examination, and the statement, if submitted to the jury at all, is left to them with an observation from the judge, that it is entitled to no weight, as coming from a party who has been neither cross-examined nor sworn—he shall be allowed, if he thinks fit, to testify on oath, but on condition that he shall be subjected, like an ordinary witness, to cross-examination. The very essence of the plan is, that the examination of the defendant shall be permissive and not compulsory; and it is difficult to imagine how, in the teeth of the legal maxim, "violenti non fit injuria," such an examination can be described as an engine of oppression, or be held to resemble in any one essential particular the brow-beating examinations to which prisoners must submit in the French Courts. In France, the accused is forced to answer every question put to him. In the plan proposed, he is not forced to answer one. In France, his examination throughout is conducted as a cross-examination, its object being to establish his guilt, rather than his innocence; and if Lord Chelmsford is an authority on these matters, "the judge endeavours, with all the practised dexterity at his command, to extort an acknowledgment of guilt." (Hans. Parl. Deb., 3rd ser. vol. clii. p. 764.) Here, it is intended that the accused should be at liberty to tell his own story without interruption, and in such a way as may best prove his innocence, and that the cross-examination shall be simply employed as a test of the truth of his statement. Again, in France, the prisoner is not sworn, and consequently whatever statements he may make in his own favour, they have not the weight which is attached to testimony on oath. Here, the proposal is, that the defendant, if examined at all, must first be sworn. In the face of these marked discrepancies, what possible analogy can fairly be drawn between the two systems?

Although, for the reasons stated above, the proposed change in the law would not expose prisoners to an oppressive examination, in one respect it would place them collectively in a worse position than they now occupy. At present, if "not guilty" be pleaded, the prosecutor has to make out his case independent of the accused, who cannot be examined either for or against himself. But once allow the defendant to testify on oath, and he will occasionally find himself in this dilemma:—Either he must attempt to deceive the jury by falsehood, in which case he will run an imminent risk of detection and additional punishment, or he must decline to be sworn, when his silence will very possibly be interpreted as presumptive evidence of his guilt. Lord Campbell asserts that this system would cause grievous hardship, because "prisoners would frequently be convicted on their own evidence;" (Hans. Parl. Deb., 3rd ser. vol. clii. p. 763.) and Lord Chelmsford is of the same opinion, because "it has ever been the boast of our law to exhibit towards the accused) the greatest forbearance, and to give them the benefit of every reasonable doubt." (Hans. Parl. Deb., 3rd ser. vol. clii. p. 765.) I have cited these assertions, not because I consider them arguments which have deserved refutation, but because, being advanced by great men, they may have an importance attached to them very different from what they intrinsically merit. Surely Lord Campbell forgot, when he used the reasoning just referred to, that the existing law permits prisoners to plead guilty, or in other words, "to be convicted on their own evidence," even without any corroborative proof. How then, on this ground, can he object to a law which merely gives the prisoner the option of being examined, and empowers the jury to convict him on his own testimony, when coupled with the other corroborative evidence which may be furnished by the prosecutor? Lord Chelmsford's reasoning is still more unsatisfactory, for it is based on an utter misconception of the doctrine which "is the boast of our law," and which induces caution lest an innocent man should be wrongfully convicted; "the doubt" of which the prisoner is to have the benefit, is a doubt as to whether he be really guilty. The law does not favour the prisoner as a criminal, but as a person who may not be a criminal. As I once before took occasion to observe, "If a criminal were tried, as a fox is hunted, for the diversion of sportsmen, and it were an object to counsel, as it is to the huntsman, to keep up the breed in order to show sport, it might then be advisable to allow due weight to the doctrine of 'forbearance,' in order to give the valuable prisoner a fair chance of escape; but if crime is really to be suppressed, let the conviction of the criminal be as certain as the law can make it. To borrow a sporting phrase, it was not by giving law that King Edgar extirpated the wolves from England." (Law Mag., xxviii, No. 57, p. 6)

" 'Though space and law the stag we lend,
Ere bound we slip, or bow we bend,
Who ever reck'd how, where, or when,
The prowling wolf was trapp'd and slain? "

Handy Book for Executors and Administrators. By THOMAS SIRRELL PRITCHARD, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Amer: 1861.

A Handy Book on the Law of Principal and Surety. By EDWARD LAWRENCE, Jun., Attorney-at-Law and Member of the Incorporated Law Society. Effingham Wilson: 1861.

Here are two new contributions to the light literature of the profession, albeit the subject of which they treat are of a nature that rather repels than invites the authors of Handy Books. The law of Executors and Administrators is of very large extent, as is known to every body who has ever turned over the leaves of the ponderous book of Mr. Justice Williams; and in addition to this extensive branch of law there is also the very wide field—to some extent still almost unworked—which the Probate Court claims for its own. But Mr. Pritchard boldly undertakes to present “at a glance, if possible,” the whole body of law and procedure touching the character, functions, duties, and liabilities of executors and administrators. A reader's glance, however, must be sufficient to take in 176 pages—not very large, to be sure—and to note a very considerable number of chapters and subdivisions embracing a great variety of topics; but yet we can say for this little work, what unfortunately cannot often be said of any of our legal manuals, that it does not consist of an unskilful collection of ill-assorted scraps, taken with or without acknowledgment from some standard work, but that it is the result of the careful attempt of a competent writer to give in the smallest compass a plain and reliable account, for the use of unprofessional persons, of an extensive and complicated head of law. The plan of the book is original, and is well calculated not less for the instruction of young students of law than it is for laymen. No cases are cited, and there is an entire absence of that kind of affectation which exhibits itself in frequent reference to useless authorities. Altogether we can recommend Mr. Pritchard's brochure for, what it professes to be, a handy book on a subject of very general interest.

Mr. Lawrance's little work is intended to supply young practitioners as well as mercantile men and those who feel a special interest in the subject, with a brief summary of the law of principal and surety. He has, in fact, sketched a regular treatise on the entire subject, and has filled in as much of it as is most likely to be valuable for practical purposes. We have no doubt that the work will be found extremely useful by those for whom it is intended. It is the production of one who is well acquainted not only with the theory but the actual practice of law upon the subject of which he treats. We especially commend Mr. Lawrance's book to persons engaged in business, to whom so simple and practical an account of the doctrine of principal and surety will, no doubt, be very acceptable.

REPORTS AND MEETINGS.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 15th inst., a dividend at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum was declared on the ordinary stock of the company.

CALEDONIAN AND DUMBARTONSHIRE JUNCTION RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 13th inst., a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was declared, leaving a balance of £973 to be carried forward.

EAST ANGLIAN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 8th inst., a dividend of 2½ per cent. on the C stock of the company was declared, after providing for the dividends in full on the A and B stock.

EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY.

At the last half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 12th inst., a dividend at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum was declared, after providing for a dividend of 5 per cent. on the preference stock.

LEEDS, BRADFORD, AND HALIFAX JUNCTION RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 8th inst., a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum was declared for the past half-year, and is now in the course of payment.

LEGAL AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of this society was held on the 12th inst. From the account submitted to the meeting it appears that there has been a considerable accession of new premiums during the past year, the sum of £14,054 12s. 6d. having been received in respect thereof. The assets of the company on the 31st of December amounted to the sum of £1,167,650 7s. 10d.

LLANIDLOES AND NEWTOWN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 12th inst., a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was declared.

LLYNVI VALLEY RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 14th inst., after providing for the 5 per cent. preference dividend, a bonus of 2 per cent. on the ordinary shares of the company was declared for the last half-year. This, with the 3 per cent. paid for the previous half-year, makes the total payment for the year on the ordinary shares, 5 per cent.

NEWCASTLE AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.

The directors, by their report, recommend a dividend of £3 17s. 6d. per cent. for the last half-year, making, with the dividend previously paid, £7 per cent. for the year. This will leave a balance of £2,833 to be carried forward.

SCOTTISH NORTH EASTERN RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company, held on the 8th inst., a dividend at the rate of 10s. per cent. per annum was declared on the ordinary Aberdeen stock.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.

At the recent half-yearly meeting of this company a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum was declared upon the consolidated stock of the company.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, 1862.—It has been certified that the aggregate of the sums, expressing the limits of the liability of the persons who executed the deed of guarantee for enabling the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1862 to obtain advances from the Bank of England, amounts to the sum of £250,000.

STATISTICS OF THE DIVORCE ACT.—A series of interesting returns, giving statistics connected with the Divorce Court, have recently been issued. The first return has been compiled with the view of showing what number of the suits which have occupied the Divorce Court since the passing of the Act under which it is constituted have arisen from acts of adultery committed anterior to that date. The whole number of petitions for dissolution of marriage on the ground alluded to which have come before the Court is 604. In by far the majority of these cases, however, the Court was simply engaged in discharging the arrears of business which had accumulated before its establishment. No fewer than 386 suits arose from acts of adultery committed in bygone years, and in one case, a petition refers to events which took place in the year 1823. As these figures bear upon the controversy which preceded the passage of the Act, it may be worth while to give some of them in detail. The number of petitions relating to acts of adultery committed in the year 1850 were 27; for the year 1851 they were 30; for 1852, 25; 1853, 36; for 1854, 38; for 1855, 39; for 1856, 59. For the earlier portion of the year 1857, up to the 28th of August, the date at which the Act was passed, the number of petitions was 36, and for the remainder of the year, 43, making a total for that year of 79. For the next year they were still more numerous—85; but in 1859 there is a decrease, the number being 66; while in 1860, up to the 21st of August, the date at which the return was moved for, the number was only 24. Another table, compiled on a principle similar to that of the first, relates to petitions for judicial separation. As the numbers in this case are considerably smaller, we need not examine them in detail. The total number of such petitions is 195. Thirty-one relate to alleged acts of adultery committed in 1857, and 26 to those of 1858, but in all the other years the numbers are considerably less.

The will of James Russell, Esq., Q.C., was proved in London on the 25th ult., by his relict, power being reserved to the other executors. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. The will was executed in 1846, and two codicils in 1854. To his relict he bequeaths an annuity of £1,000, and an immediate legacy of £1,200, stating that he gives her these bequests out of love and regard, as she is amply provided for by deeds of settlement, added to which he leaves her his town residence and all his furniture. His estate at Tor Royal he has left to his eldest son, whom he has appointed his residuary legatee, and to whom he has given the prizes he (the testator) obtained when at school and at college, as well as the medal which he received as a badge of distinguished merit when a student at the University; to each of his sons the testator has given a legacy of £10,000; and to each of his daughters, on attaining twenty-one, or marriage, he has given a legacy of £3,000, and a life interest also in £5,000 to each of them, which bequests are also further increased by legacies in the codicils. There are some small annuities and legacies left by the testator to his brothers, sisters, and other relatives and friends; and Mr. Russell has left to his clerk, Mr. Wallace, an annuity of £100. His law library he has bequeathed to his two sons, James Cholmeley and Richard Bruce. To his executors, the Hon. Edward Lascelles and K. D. Hodgson, Esq., and to the father of the latter gentleman, he leaves the sum of fifty guineas each, and a like legacy to his intimate friend Lord Justice Knight Bruce.

UNITED KINGDOM LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 8, WATERLOO PLACE, FALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

The Hon. FRANCIS SCOTT, CHAIRMAN.

CHARLES BERWICK CURTIS, Esq., DEPUTY CHAIRMAN.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 2 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without the risk of co-partnership.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are given as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,947 10	£6,947 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1859, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

For prospectuses, &c., apply to the Resident Director, No. 8, Waterloo-place, Fall-mall.

By order, E. L. BOYD, Resident Director.

PROMOTER LIFE ASSURANCE OFFICE,

London: established in 1826.—This SOCIETY has REMOVED to its new offices, 29, Fleet-street. Every description of assurance effected. Low rates without profits. Moderate rates with profits.

CURRENT TOPICS.

In our Parliamentary report of the discussion upon the Bankruptcy Bill, which took place in the House of Commons on last Monday evening, will be seen what took place upon Sir Richard Bethell's motion to repeal the solicitors' advocacy clause in the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849. It is by that enactment that solicitors have the right to appear and plead in courts of bankruptcy without being required to employ counsel. It was thought by many persons, when Sir Richard Bethell gave notice of his intention to move the repeal of this clause, without giving in his notice any intimation of the importance of its provisions, that it was a mere mistake in the number of the section of the Act of Parliament. It was hard to believe that even Sir Richard Bethell had the hardihood to attempt in this covert manner to interfere with the statutory powers and privileges of so large and important a body as the solicitors of England. The sceptics, however, are now left without room for doubt. The Attorney-General moved for, and obtained, a repeal of the clause, observing at the same time, however, that he had no intention to deprive solicitors of any powers or privileges which they now possess; and, therefore, in lieu of the repealed section he proposed a new clause, to be inserted in the present Bill, providing that solicitors may appear and practise in any of the courts of bankruptcy other than the chief court. Fortunately, the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association had entrusted Mr. Murray with a vigorous petition to the House of Commons, against the repeal of the advocacy clause, and some members of the House were prepared to do battle if occasion required. The explanation of the Attorney-General appears to have been considered altogether satisfactory; and the effect of the new clause, it is assumed, will be exactly what he described it. That this is a mistake, however, is clearly pointed out by Mr. Ford (Messrs. Rogerson & Ford), in a communication from him with which we have been favoured. The repeal of the section in question, says Mr. Ford, "would render it incumbent on creditors and bankrupts to instruct counsel on application for the 'Order of Discharge,' which, under the 163rd clause of the Bill, is substituted for the present 'Certificate of Conformity,' thereby greatly increasing the expense to creditors and bankrupts. The repeal of such section will deprive creditors and bankrupts of the privilege which, under that section, they at present enjoy of being heard by their solicitors on applications for certificates of conformity. Under the existing law, the Commissioners of Bankruptcy adjudicate upon bankrupts' applications for certificates; but under the 163rd clause of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, every application for an order of discharge which is opposed (and notice of opposition will undoubtedly be given in a majority of cases), is, in the London Court of Bankruptcy, to be heard and decided by the chief judge; and the commissioner who has acted in the prosecution of the bankruptcy is to attend at the hearing as assessor to the chief judge. The Attorney-General proposes that solicitors shall be only heard before commissioners and the chief judge in chambers, but deprives them and suitors of the right of audience on applications for orders of discharge when opposed; so that their privilege does not remain intact. Creditors and bankrupts must therefore incur the cost of instructions to and seeing counsel."

It is not too late yet to take action in this matter, and it is one on which the entire body of the profession should bring its strength immediately to bear.

Sir Francis Goldsmid has given notice of his intention to oppose in the House of Commons Lord St. Leonards' Bill on Constructive Notice, and no doubt he will be supported in his opposition by Mr. Malins, who on a former occasion, when the sole clause contained in this Bill was substantially included in Lord St. Leonards' Law of Property Bill, 1858, successfully opposed the enactment of that clause. We have already proved beyond question, that the Bill, if passed as it now stands, so far from abolishing the equitable doctrine of notice, although in terms professing to do so, would, in truth, declare by statutory enactment, what is now the doctrine, and that it would make such declaration in inapt words, and after a most illogical fashion. The true meaning of the Bill, put into proper language, is as follows:—

"The validity of any purchase shall not be impeached by any notice to the purchaser, unless in the opinion of the Court he in the matter of the purchase shall have been guilty of fraud or shall have been wilfully negligent."

But the proposition contained in these words, is, in fact, the present doctrine of the courts of equity, and we are unable to discover any advantage that can be derived from embodying in an Act of Parliament what has been so well defined by judges, and has heretofore received such ample illustration.

Our attention has been called to a circular addressed to country solicitors, on behalf of some anonymous person—a London address, however, and an ostensible name being given as some guarantee of the genuineness of the document. For the edification of our readers we print this curious advertisement, omitting, for obvious reasons, the reference and address which it contains.

"A solicitor, practising in the immediate vicinity of the public offices, has made arrangements for the transaction of a particular branch of agency business, comprising the filing of documents, making searches, stamping deeds, &c., &c. upon such terms as he trusts will meet with the approbation of the profession. On the other side will be found examples of the charges alluded to, and which may be taken as a specimen of those generally adopted. It is hoped this will not be construed as an endeavour to divert from the ordinary channels any of the more legitimate business of the London agent. The idea has originated in the frequent complaint of country practitioners of the want of a responsible medium for the transaction of the minor matters of business, without incurring expenses for the same, which are scarcely chargeable to their clients."

We have generally abstained from incumbering our columns with the advertisements of sham lawyers, as we always deemed that a contrary course—except where it is required for some special reasons—is worse than useless. Nothing is easier than to pick up such productions, except to reiterate the same vapid common-places about them. None of our readers, however, require any evidence as to the abundance of impostors who seek, in the guise of "Cheap Jacks," to entrap the unwary; nor do lawyers need to be told, week after week, what great evils result from the practice of these fellows. If, indeed, the unprofessional press could be induced to take up the subject, such advocacy might be expected to produce some good; but no advantage that we can see is likely to accrue from the increased publicity which is given to these fraudulent advertisements in a legal journal, to the comments of which on such a subject any layman who happens to read them will probably attribute not much weight. We have departed from our usual rule on the present occasion, because the question is one which is to be decided by lawyers themselves; and is one in which provincial solicitors are quite as much interested as their metropolitan brethren. We believe that the present charge allowed upon taxation to a country solicitor for searching for judgments, &c., is £1 6s. 8d., of which the regular agency charge is 13s. 4d.; but if the latter is reduced to 3s. 4d., or if, in fact, a solicitor sometimes pays but that amount, is it not most likely that in such instances he would be allowed on taxation only the sum of 6s. 8d. instead of £1 6s. 8d. as at present? The same observation applies to others of the items mentioned in this circular. The state of transition in which the law has been for some years past, and many of the alterations which have been made in it, have no doubt had the immediate effect of reducing the business, or, at all events, the profits of the legal profession. It has also lost much by the encroachments of so-called agents and sham practitioners; but we are satisfied that much worse results would follow from disunion and disloyalty in the profession itself; and repudiating most strongly as we do the allegation that we are more devoted to metropolitan than to provincial interests—which has been persistently made in the desperate hope of propping up an effete legal contemporary—we have no hesitation in saying that nothing but general damage can be the result of the patronage by country solicitors of such scheming and anonymous touters as the author of the circular which we have given above.

A curious miscarriage of justice took place at York assizes last week, under the following circumstances. A man named Hudson, holding a respectable position in life as a woolstapler, at Bradford, Yorkshire, was indicted for perjury committed before the registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy at Leeds. As the prisoner had been, until very recently, a member of the Bradford town council the case excited considerable interest. Of course it became necessary to prove that the oath had been duly taken before the registrar, but all that the prosecution could prove was that it had been taken "before an elderly gentleman without a wig," whereupon the case ignominiously broke down, and the prisoner was acquitted.

Now if the oath was not duly administered by the registrar, it is clear that the business of the Court of Bankruptcy at Leeds is conducted in a slovenly fashion; whereas if it was so administered, and evidence could have been procured of that fact, the case for the prosecution was badly got up. We are informed, however, that the prisoner was duly sworn in the presence of the registrar, that the examination was properly conducted before him, and moreover that abundant evidence of these facts was easily procurable. If this be so, the fault rests with those who conducted the prosecution, or rather with the Treasury, which doles out such miserable allowances to prosecuting attorneys that they are totally unable to do that justice to their cases which might reasonably be expected from them under a more liberal scale of payment. In an important prosecution like the one to which we refer, it would surely not be unreasonable that the attorney should have the assistance of counsel in advising upon the evidence before the case is launched in court. If, however, he procured such assistance he must have done so out of his own pocket. In fact the fees allowed to him for preparing the brief and attending at the assizes are so ridiculously small that he cannot afford to give in return for them that labour and skill without the exercise of which justice must often be defeated. The consequences of this state of things is most lamentable. Either Hudson was guilty of perjury, or he was not. If he was guilty, a malefactor of very deep dye has escaped punishment; whereas if he was innocent he has been deprived of that opportunity of being tried and acquitted on the merits of the case, without which his acquittal, owing to a mere formal defect in the evidence, can be of little value to an honest man. At the same assizes, Mr. Justice Keating proceeded to sentence on Monday morning a batch of prisoners who had pleaded guilty on Saturday. On the first prisoner being put up his lordship expressed a wish to see the prosecutor with a view to asking some questions, the answers to which might have a bearing on the sentence. Neither attorney, nor prosecutor, nor witnesses, were present. They had all gone home on Saturday night. The same wish was expressed and the same answer returned in another case, whereupon his lordship observed that although he was a great enemy to unnecessary expense, he thought it highly desirable that where the prisoners pleaded guilty, cases should not be considered as concluded until the sentences were passed, as by the absence of all persons connected with the prosecution he was unable to give judgments entirely satisfactory to his own mind for want of adequate information. The sudden flight of prosecutors and witnesses from York is, however, easily accounted for, when we remember that they must live, eat, and sleep there for 24 hours at the rate of 6s., or at all events must pay anything beyond that sum out of their own funds. An instance of the extraordinary tenacity with which the Treasury holds the purse strings was afforded at the same assizes in the case of Reg. v. Nightingale & Another. The prisoners were indicted for obtaining money by false pretences, and also for a conspiracy to cheat. On the first charge the prosecution failed, but succeeded in obtaining a conviction on the second. The taxing officer thereupon refused to allow the costs, the prosecutor not being entitled to the costs of an indictment for a conspiracy to cheat, and the charge of false pretences having failed. The learned judge, however, on the circumstances being mentioned to him, ordered the costs of the prosecution to be allowed, on the ground that the prosecutor and witnesses had been bound over before the justices to prosecute and give evidence on a charge of false pretences, and that an indictment for that offence had been duly preferred. We fear from what has been recently said by Sir G. C. Lewis that there is little hope of any early amendment of the present scale of costs; but we shall certainly continue to fulfil that duty which we owe not less to the public than to the profession, by showing the great evils of which the system is the parent.

TAXATION OF SUITORS.—No. VI. COURTS OF JUSTICE—AS BANKERS.

Now, that a royal commission has been appointed to investigate and report upon one of the most important branches of the subject touched upon in these papers, we intend to conclude the series with the present article. In the earlier articles we considered several questions involving both principles and details relating to the imposition of court fees, or, in other words, legal taxes. It is obvious, however, that such fertile topics as legal taxation, its incidence, mode of collection, control and supervision, require for their adequate treatment greater space than we can afford. The same observation applies to the questions glanced at in our later articles. Apart from the several subjects to which we have just referred, but very closely connected with them, are the purely financial and administrative questions as to the mode of levying law taxes (whether by fees or stamps) and the custody, management and distribution of the money so received, as well as the custody and investment of the very large funds which in the course of litigation are confided to, and become subject to the orders of, our judicial tribunals. The commission which has just been issued by the Crown is confined wholly to the latter branch of the general subject. The commissioners are merely to inquire into the mode of doing business in the office of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, and into the custody and management of its funds. It will not be part of their duty to institute any inquiries into the custody or management of the funds committed to the care of the Common Law Courts, or rather to the care of the private bankers of the masters of those courts. In our last article we showed cause, we think unanswerably, why the scope of the Commission should have been extended so as to embrace the Courts of Common Law; and we promised to furnish some information as to the banking arrangements of the Court of Bankruptcy, the Court for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, and the County Courts. We now proceed to redeem that promise; and, first,

As to the Bankruptcy Court:

All monies arising from each bankrupt's estate are paid to the official assignee of such estate. Each official assignee is permitted to retain out of the several estates whereof he is assignee, a sum not exceeding £5,000, and is required to pay the residue of the monies in his hands monthly into the Bank of England to the credit of the Accountant in Bankruptcy. The amount so paid in during the year 1860 was £868,000, and after deducting from the amount so from time to time paid in, the amount paid out to the creditors, there remained, on the 31st day of December 1860, £1,436,241 stock, invested on the bankruptcy fund account; the interest whereof is appropriated towards defraying the salaries of the officers of the court and other expenses connected therewith. In addition to the above money there was also paid into the Bank of England, to the Chief Registrar's account, during 1860, the sum of £73,382 by the official assignees, and £16,939 by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, which were appropriated in like manner.

The return of the Accountant in Bankruptcy made to Parliament on the 1st March, 1861, shews that the following were the net balances on 1st January, 1860:—

1 General Account of Bankrupt's Estates.	2 Bankruptcy Fund Account.	3 Unclaimed Dividend Account.	4 Chief Registrar's Account.
£ s. d. 17,691 7 11 Stock. 88,100 0 0 Exchequer Bills. 68,102 7 7 Cash.	£ s. d. 1,436,241 6 3 Stock.	£ s. d. 258 11 9 Cash. 42,150 9 1 Stock.	£ s. d. 17,641 7 11 Cash. 129,745 13 1 Stock.

This return was issued on the same day as the Chancery Accountant-General's return as to the Suitor's Funds for 1860, but does not give even so much information as that imperfect account; indeed, the different accounts kept in bankruptcy appear to be somewhat mystified; and they would no doubt be clearer after they had gone through the filtering of a Royal commission.

As between the Accountant in Bankruptcy and the Bank of England, the latter keep with the former a simple debtor and creditor account, as with any ordinary customer; and at the accountant's office in the Bankruptcy Court a debtor and creditor account is kept of each bankrupt's estate. When a dividend is declared on a bankrupt's estate, an order authorizing the same is made by the Commissioner, which is annexed to a list prepared by the official assignee, showing the amount payable to each creditor. This order and list are sent to the Accountant in Bankruptcy who issues to each creditor a cheque for his dividend, which is paid in the same office by one of the clerks from the Bank of England, who attends there for the purpose.

The total amount paid into the Bank of England in respect of bankrupts' estates in 1860, was about one million, and the total amount paid out was about the same, and the remuneration paid to the Bank of England was for that year £2,291, exclusive of the profits arising from the balance on the accountant's account at the Bank of England, which on the 1st day of January, 1861, amounted to £106,002 cash.

As to the Insolvent Court:

As this Court will become absorbed in the Court of Bankruptcy on the passing of the Bankruptcy Act, now before Parliament, we have not investigated the existing mode of transacting the financial business of this Court. No return appears to have been made to Parliament during the present session as to the funds arising from business in that Court.

As to the County Courts:

All monies paid into these courts by the suitors, as well as the fees of court collected from the suitors, are paid in cash to the registrars of the different courts, whose accounts are quarterly, or oftener, audited and settled by the treasurers of these courts. They are paid the balance of the various monies received by the Clerks, after allowing the amounts retained and paid by them for the salaries of themselves and the high bailiffs, and also paid to the suitors, and after permitting them to retain sufficient for the current expenditure of the court. The treasurers render their accounts annually to the audit office, where they are examined and audited, and such portion of any surplus in their hands as the Commissioners of the Treasury may direct, is paid to the Paymaster-General. It appears by the judicial statistics for 1859, that the amount of the judgments obtained by plaintiffs in that year was £851,732; and that the fees on proceedings paid by the suitors during that year was £215,623. The treasurer, registrar, and high bailiff, give security for such sum as the Treasury may order, for the due accounting for, and payment of, all monies received by them. The amount paid in 1860 to the treasurers for their salaries, exclusive of travelling expenses was £20,000, the whole whereof it is believed might be saved if the fees were collected by stamps, as in the Court of Probate, and the produce paid into the Exchequer; and if the amount paid into court by the suitors were, instead of being paid to the registrars, paid into one of the money-order-offices attached to the post-office, a security more efficient than the present would thereby be provided, and the services of the treasurers might be wholly dispensed with, and a saving to the public effected of £20,000 a year; but if the very numerous and low amount of the fees in these courts should render the introduction of the system of stamps for collecting the fees inexpedient, or the adoption of the money order system inadvisable, we should hope that the authorities at the Treasury might suggest and establish some system of audit of the registrar's accounts more economical than the present, and equally as effective, and so admit of dispensing with the services of the treasurers, and thereby effect a saving of at least £20,000 a year.

We have now touched upon the financial statistics and arrangements of all the leading courts of this country. At some future, but not distant, time, we hope to be in a position to give information of the same kind about the courts of Ireland and Scotland, as there must be considerable advantage in being able to compare the different systems in the three kingdoms. At all events, unmixed good will result from the revelations which are to be made as to the great variety of methods adopted for the custody and management of court funds, not only as between one kingdom and another, but as between all the different courts of the same kingdom.

The entire subject is one in which solicitors, as a class above all others are most deeply interested. We think we have shown that good management will enable very great reductions to be made in the amount of court fees. This would be directly beneficial to the suitor, and both directly and indirectly highly serviceable to the profession; while neither has any kind of advantage from the present system of mismanagement. It is, therefore, with pleasure that we acknowledge the very valuable services in reference to this question of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association. Since 1848 that body has laboured most usefully on the subject of legal finance, as will be seen in the memorial to the Royal Commissioners which will be found elsewhere in our columns. We earnestly invite the attention of the country solicitors to the general subject of law taxes, and particularly to that phase of it which comes most frequently under their observation in the shape of court fees.

THE REPEAL OF THE TWENTY-NINTH CANON.

An attempt has been recently made by the Convocation of Canterbury to repeal one of the Canons of 1603. Their first step was to petition the Queen, stating that they were desirous that the 29th Canon should be altered or amended, and praying for her royal licence to "make, promulge, and execute" such altered and amended Canon. Upon this petition the licence of the Crown was duly granted, with the proviso that the Canon so to be altered or amended should not be contrary or repugnant "to the doctrines, order, and ceremonies of the Church of England, already established;" and provided also that the Canon should not be of any force, effect, or validity in the law, but only so much thereof, and after such time, as the Queen, under the great seal, should approve and confirm.

The licence having been obtained, it still remained a question whether the proposed alteration, when made, would be of any legal force; the doubt arising not upon the general powers of Convocation itself, but springing out of the particular nature of the desired amendment. Legal opinion was taken; and the points submitted to counsel were twofold: first, whether the portion of the Canon which enacts that no parent shall be admitted to answer as godfather for his own child is declaratory of the ancient usage and law of the Church of England; and, second, whether the alteration or repeal when sanctioned by her Majesty, would relieve members of the Church of England from the obligation in regard to sponsors now laid upon them. The opinion of Mr. Archibald Stephens was given separately in November last. In answer to the first question, he considered the prohibitory part of the enactment in the 29th Canon was (using the language of Lord Hardwicke in Middleton v. Crofts, 2 Atk. 650) declaratory of the ancient usage and law of the Church of England, received and allowed here, which in that respect and by virtue of such ancient allowance, will bind the laity, and much more the clergy. The dictum of Lord Hardwicke is, to the minds of lawyers, an authority in itself, and requires no support; but, in answer to arguments which may be brought forward to disturb that dictum, Mr. Stephen prefaces his conclusion with a series of elaborate historical and legal propositions, of which it is impossible to give more than the most general indication here. He states that as early as in the fourth century it was an established custom that a person different from the parent should act as a sponsor in baptism, and that in the sixth century the tenet of a spiritual relationship resulting from the office was found existing in the Church. In Britain, in the seventh century, laws were promulgated forbidding marriage between baptized persons and their sponsors, on the ground of this doctrine of spiritual affinity, and the prohibition was repealed in various forms, and by different authorities for many succeeding centuries. Finally, it is shown that certain of the reformers, and of the bishops since the reformation, designate the enactment of the Canon as "the ancient custom of the Church." The reply to the second question was as follows:—Mr. Stephen concludes: "Unless an Act of Parliament be obtained, the Convocation of Canterbury cannot alter any of the ancient customs or laws of the realm, by making or putting in execution a new Canon permitting parents to be sponsors for their children. The mere repeal of the 29th Canon by the Convocation of Canterbury, notwithstanding the assent of the Queen, would not release the clergy and laity of that province from the obligation imposed on them by virtue of the ancient custom or law in respect of sponsors." The reasons are mainly twofold; first, that by the Act of Submission (the 25 Hen. 8, c. 19) Convocation is prohibited from enacting any canons that would be contrary to the customs or laws of England. If, therefore, the disability of parents to be sponsors is an ancient custom of the Church, as contended for above, it is plain that no power to enact a Canon releasing parents from such disability exists in Convocation. Another reason for the above conclusion—an argument which is commonly relied upon as being founded on more modern authority—is this. The rubric is confirmed by the Act of Uniformity, and is in a measure embodied into the statute law. The language in the rubric with regard to sponsorship in baptism is not explicit; but it clearly marks a distinction between parents and sponsors, and Mr. Stephen argues with great weight, and with abundant illustrations, that upon the construction of the rubric, no other conclusion can be drawn than that the words "godfather" and "god-mother," in their legal acceptation, exclude the natural parents. Collateral questions affecting the relations between the Churches of England and Ireland, are also discussed; but they have little bearing on the argument.

The next step taken was to submit the same questions, along with the above highly elaborated opinion, to Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Sir Hugh Cairns, and Mr. Richard Jebb. In a few lines, the joint opinion of these three learned persons confirms the former, and states their view to be that, having regard to the Uniformity Act, the state of the Canon Law, and the ancient usage and law of the Church of England, "any alteration or repeal of the 27th canon, such as is proposed by the Convocation of Canterbury, would not, if sanctioned by her Majesty, have the effect of relieving the members of the Church, lay or clerical, in the province of Canterbury, from the obligation which they think now exists, that a child shall be presented for baptism by sponsors other than its parents."

A party in the Church which looks unfavourably upon what is called "synodical action," takes its stand upon this opinion, and, carrying the matter a step further, asserts that an attempt, made on the part of the Convocation, to induce others to commit an act which is contrary to law, must be unlawful in itself, as well as void and ineffectual.

It is obvious that the view taken by counsel was opposed to the wishes of the clergy assembled in Convocation; and it is, therefore, no matter of surprise to find that they proceeded to act in opposition to the opinion they had obtained. On the 27th of February, the Upper House re-enacted a Canon which varied the existing one by the omission from the title of the words "fathers not to be godfathers in baptism;" and from the body of the Canon the words "No parent shall be urged to be present nor be admitted to answer as godfather for his own child." The speakers who touched upon the legal question were mainly the Bishops of Oxford and London. The contention of the Bishop of Oxford, who submitted the alteration to the House, was to this effect. Upon the question as to the ancient practice of the Church in the first four centuries, the Bishop admits Mr. Stephen's authority to be a fair one, showing that in the year 400 it was an established custom that a person different from the parents should act as sponsor for a child; but he cites, also, St. Augustine as an authority to prove the ancient custom of the Church to be, that parents should themselves come with the child, and be accompanied by other persons, friends, who were to supply or answer the whole of the service which the Church committed to their charge. The Bishop thus skilfully introduces the idea that presence of parents was in ancient times the important, primary, and necessary feature in baptism, and that of sponsors only subsidiary. This prepares the way for what follows. He deals with the customary law of England thus. He does not deny the custom of the country to have been that persons other than parents should be sponsors; but he affirms that the doctrine sprung out of the Romish dogma of "spiritual affinity" above alluded to. With that principle, argues the Bishop, the English custom rose, and with that it must fall. He then proceeds to say that a statute of the 32 Hen. 8, c. 38: "for marriages to stand, notwithstanding pre-contracts," lays it down in the preamble and enacting part (we cite here from a report in the Guardian) that the whole notion of spiritual affinity was the invention of the Pope, invented partly from his vanity, and partly from his love of lucre; and that the statute enacts that this principle and all the statutes founded upon it, should have no force or effect in this realm. A more remarkable reading than this of an Act of Parliament was probably never given. We subjoin the only words which seem in the least degree to touch on the subject, and ask any reader to discover in them, if he can, any reference, express or implied, to the doctrine of "spiritual" affinity as between baptized persons and their sponsors. 32 Hen. 8, c. 38: "An Act for Marriages to stand, notwithstanding Pre-contracts. Whereas, heretofore the usurped power of the Bishop of Rome hath always entangled and troubled the meer jurisdiction and regal power of this realm of England, &c. . . .

"Further also, by reason of other prohibitions than God's law admitteth for their lucre by that Court invented, the dispensations for which they always reserved to themselves, as in kindred or affinity between cousin germanes, and so to fourth and fourth degree, carnal knowledge of any of the same kin, or affinity before in such outward degrees, which else were lawful and be not prohibited by God's law." . . .

The statute then enacts: "That marriage contract and solemnized in the face of the Church, and consummate, &c, shall be lawful, &c., notwithstanding any pre-contracts of matrimony, not consummate with bodily knowledge, and that no reservation or prohibition, God's law except, shall trouble or impeach any marriage without the Levitical degree."

The doctrine of "spiritual affinity" may possibly be no longer part of the teaching of the English Church, but that it was repealed by the above Act of Parliament is, probably, what no lawyer will be found to admit. Such, however, was the Bishop of Oxford's argument. He felt the necessity of proving that the practice of having sponsors other than parents in baptism is not one of the ancient customs of the realm of England, and these are the steps by which he attempted to establish the proof. There was still another difficulty to be met, which was this. If the doctrine of spiritual affinity were thus abolished, how comes it that a canon, grounded, according to the Bishop of Oxford's argument, on the principle of spiritual affinity, still exists? The Bishop answers, it was preserved for a totally different purpose. There was an erroneous doctrine abroad that the elect parent must present the child for baptism as an elect child, and no one but the parents could properly covenant for it. It was to bear witness against this error that the Canon was preserved, even after the Reformation.

The Bishop of London treated the matter in a different way. He said, "Our friend the Prolocutor wishes to drive us into a dilemma, and his dilemma appears to be this. 'Either the statute law of the land allows parents to be godfathers at present, or it forbids it; and you say parents may become sponsors. Your saying so will not give parents any legal power to become sponsors; and if the statute law permits them, what is the use of making any alteration in the Canon?' I think that the whole of the argument, and, like all dilemmas, it is very liable to be retorted, and it may be retorted in this way. Either the statute law of the land allows us to do this or forbids it. If it allows us to do it, we had better certainly remove from our Canons something that prohibits and which is not entitled to be there. If it prohibits it, we are, at all events, not doing anything contrary to the law by, under her Majesty's sanction, considering what is the best thing to do in order that the matter may be finally laid before Parliament for further alteration."

In this spirit the rest of the discussion seems to have followed, for the legal difficulty was not combated by any succeeding speaker.

In the Lower House of Convocation a long discussion took place, and the amended Canon was finally returned to the Upper House, with a request that certain additions should be made to it respecting the answers of godfathers and godmothers in the baptismal service, and respecting the necessity of sponsors having been communicants. But the force of the legal objection, which is certainly supported by high authority, and which goes to the very root of the whole proceeding, seems to have been little felt, or, if felt, to have been disregarded.

We are compelled to hold over until the end of next week an article upon the new law examination at the Law Institution; and also other articles.

VICE CHANCELLOR'S COURT.

(Vice-Chancellor STUART.)

March 18.—Accommodation for the Vice-Chancellors in Lincoln's-inn.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR, in the course of the hearing a cause, holding up as "an exhibit" a volume, the binding of which was so much destroyed that the back of it was off, and addressing Mr. Malins, "as a legislator," said that the room at his chambers in which his books were kept and in which he sat was so low and damp that his library was being destroyed. As a consolation, he had been told that he could purchase the whole of Vesey, jun.'s, reports for 27s., which, by the way, was not a bad test of the low estimation in which that valuable repertory of law was held by the present generation of lawyers. His Honour added that he constantly received written complaints from solicitors of the bad accommodation which was provided for them in his chambers.

Mr. Malins said that he would take an early opportunity of bringing the attention of that branch of the Legislature to which he belonged to the subject of his Honour's complaint. If the society of Lincoln's-inn had been allowed to take the course which it proposed in this matter, good accommodation would by this time have been provided in Lincoln's-inn for the Equity Courts and Vice-Chancellor's chambers. It had been said that the accommodation required would be in existence in another year by the completion of the scheme for the centralization of the law and equity courts at the back of Carey-street. He, however, thought that scheme would not be completed for at least seven years.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—More likely 27 years.

HOME CIRCUIT.—LEWES.

The commission was opened in this town on Monday last by Lord Chief Justice Erle, and Mr. Justice Wightman.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—YORK.

(Before Mr. Justice HILL.)

March 16.—Dryden v. Taylor.—This was an action for negligence brought against the defendant as an attorney.

The plaintiff, it appeared, is a surgeon at Halifax, and the defendant an attorney at Bradford. The plaintiff employed the defendant to prepare for him proper securities to secure the repayment to him of a loan of £344, lent by him to a person named Mount, who became tenant of a mill belonging to the plaintiff, the money being advanced for the purpose of purchasing proper machinery for the mill. It was agreed that a bill of sale should be executed assigning all the machinery in the mill to the plaintiff as security. The bill of sale, however, was so drawn that it had reference only to the machinery then in the mill, and, also, it was not properly registered. The defendant had also at the same time drawn up an agreement to be signed by the plaintiff and Mount, whereby the plaintiff agreed to demise the machinery in the mill to Mount, he agreeing to pay for it by instalments of £10 a quarter, and to pay interest on the residue of the money advanced, on failure of any one of these quarterly payments the plaintiff to be at liberty to seize the machinery. The effect of this agreement was, so long as the quarterly payments were regularly made, to operate as a defeasance of the bill of sale. Mount getting into difficulties the bill of sale could not be enforced, other creditors seized the machinery, and the plaintiff was without remedy. For this negligence of the defendant, as an attorney, to take proper securities the present action was brought. At the suggestion of his lordship the case was referred to Mr. Bell, the clerk of assize, to say what should be done between the parties as gentlemen, and what compensation ought fairly to be made, an offer which it was said the defendant had already made.

On these terms a juror was withdrawn.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—TAUNTON.

The commission was opened in this town on the 19th ult., by Mr. Justices Willes.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

March 18.—The March adjourned general sessions of the peace for the county of Middlesex commenced this morning at Clerkenwell, before Mr. Bodkin, the assistant-judge, Mr. Payne, deputy, Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench, and a large number of the magistrates of the county.

The Queen has been pleased to confer the honour of knighthood upon Colley Harman Scotland, Esq., Chief Justice of Madras.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 15.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

Lord CRANWORTH, in moving the second reading of this Bill, stated it was with some few exceptions similar to that introduced by his lordship last session. By the present Bill he proposed to provide that in future deeds conveying land for charitable purposes need not be indented, and to modify the provision in the Mortmain Act as to revocation or reservation for the benefit of the grantor or donor. The Bill provided that in future no deed for charitable uses should be void by reason of any specified stipulations for the donor's benefit, and also that the conveyance of a copyhold for such uses should not be vitiated for want of a deed. He proposed also to render valid the conveyance of the property by one deed and the declaration of the charity by another, if enrolled.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he viewed the Bill with but little satisfaction. At the same time he hoped that if it passed it would be the precursor of a great improvement in the law of mortmain among the other amendments of the law.

Lord ABINGER opposed; and

Lord WENSLEYDALE and Lord CHELMSFORD supported the Bill.

The Bill was read a second time.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

Monday, March 18.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this Bill. It was proposed by the Bill that if it were made out to the satisfaction of the Lord Chancellor, that those persons who had incomes under a fixed sum were lunatic, and if after notice they made no objection, the Lord Chancellor should have the power to dispose of the property as if a commission had issued, and they had been regularly found insane. It was also proposed to make the registrar in lunacy a permanent officer.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY concurred in the measure.

LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

The report of amendments on this Bill was received.

ALLOWANCES TO PROSECUTORS AND WITNESSES.

Colonel SMYTH asked the Home Secretary whether he was prepared to alter the scale of allowances to prosecutors and witnesses at assizes and quarter sessions.

Sir G. C. LEWIS said that though the scale of allowances had been complained of by some counties, the complaint was not at all general, and under the circumstances he did not feel justified in recommending a general increase in them. But he was prepared to bring in a Bill to enable any county that thought the allowance insufficient to make an addition to them out of the county rates.

FUNDS IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

Sir H. CAIRNS asked for an explanation on the subject of the funds of the Court of Chancery which amounted to nearly £2,000,000. The Hon. Member, after referring to the recent commission for inquiring into the Accountant-General's office, and commenting upon the commissioners, said that the question was not so much who were upon the commission as who were not upon it. This was the first time when a commission had been appointed to inquire into the Court of Chancery that there were not placed upon it some of those who were most experienced in the working of the court, and responsible for its action—the judges in Chancery. A reason for their exclusion did present itself, which he would mention in order that it might be contradicted if it were not the true reason. Upon the former commission several of the Chancery judges, the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Turner, Vice-Chancellors Wood and Stuart were examined, and they all thought it was a most grave and serious matter to deal in any way with the funds of the Court of Chancery, except for the benefit of the suitors, and that it was a question deserving great consideration, and, in their minds, one involving much doubt, whether it was a legitimate course for the Chancellor of the Exchequer or any one to take the money which had always been regarded as the sole property of the suitors. All circumstances seemed to argue that the commission was intended to carry out and establish a foregone conclusion at which the Government had arrived, and in some way to connect the Treasury with the funds of the Court of Chancery. He had heard a rumour that it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose that some new stock should be created, to be called Chancery stock, and that the funds of the suitors in Chancery should be required to be invested in that stock at a fixed rate of interest. He did not know whether there was any ground for that rumour, but he must say that he could conceive nothing more at variance with the legislation of the last few years than any such scheme. He should be glad to hear from the right hon. gentleman that no such scheme was in contemplation. He desired to ask what were the specific purposes which the commission was intended to work out; next, at what time the commission would commence its sittings; and, lastly, whether the Government would object to do that which had hitherto been an invariable practice, and to advise her Majesty to add to the commission other names, and especially those of some of the judges of the Court of Chancery, who might be able and willing to give them assistance.

SALE AND TRANSFER OF LANDS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL (in answer to Mr. Hopwood) said he hoped to bring in a Bill on this subject shortly before Easter.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The House resolved itself into committee on this Bill.

Clause 197 was agreed to.

Clause 198 was amended so as to run that "a majority in numbers including three-fourths in value" should approve of any trust deed.

Clauses 199 to 206 were also agreed to.

On clause 207 empowering the creditors of deceased debtors to petition the Court for the distribution of the estate of the deceased,

Sir H. CAIRNS said the committee had arrived at what were called the "dead man's clauses." And after stating his reasons why these clauses should be omitted from the Bill, hoped the Attorney-General would see the expediency of omitting them. If not, he should when the proper time arrived deem it to be his duty to take with respect to them the sense of the committee.

These clauses were also opposed by Mr. MALINS, Mr. ROLT and other members. After some discussion the objections were waived upon the understanding that the question whether the clauses should be retained or omitted, and should be determined on the report, the restriction of their operation to debtors who were traders at the time of their death being expunged.

On schedule G. being read, which comprises a list of the Acts and parts of Acts proposed to be repealed by the Bill,

Mr. MOFFATT, observed that among the enactments proposed to be repealed was the 247th section of the Consolidated Bankrupt Act, which empowers every solicitor duly admitted as a solicitor of the Court of Bankruptcy to appear and plead in any proceedings in the court without being required to employ counsel. He wished to ask if the hon. and learned gentleman was in a position to give the committee a statement of his reasons for repealing this clause. The effect of the repeal would be to withdraw from solicitors the right which they now possessed of practising as advocates in a class of business with which they were even more competent to deal than the gentlemen of the long robe.

Mr. MURRAY said that it was proposed by this schedule wholly to repeal the 247th section. The hon. and learned gentleman had not given any notice of his intentions in this respect; but he (Mr. Murray) held in his hand a petition on the subject from the chairman and members of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL interposing said: If the hon. and learned member will permit me, perhaps I had better state to the committee the course I am about to take, and that will relieve the committee from the necessity of hearing the petition read. It is not in the least my intention to deprive solicitors of any powers which they now possess, or of any privileges which they have always held. I mean as far as the present Bill is concerned, that those powers and privileges shall remain intact. But I have been obliged to make an alteration in the law in consequence of the establishment of a chief court in bankruptcy, to be presided over by a chief judge, and I am sure that solicitors would never for one moment propose to practise there. The following is the new clause which I propose to substitute for that which is to be repealed. "Every solicitor of the High Court of Chancery, now or hereafter admitted as a solicitor of the Court of Bankruptcy, may practise as such solicitor in the said court, or in any district court, and as to all matters before the Commissioners or in chambers may appear and plead, without being required to employ counsel; and in case any person not being such solicitor shall practise in the court as a solicitor, he shall be deemed guilty of a contempt of court, and be liable to all the penalties incident thereto."

Mr. MURRAY expressed himself satisfied. He thought that clause would meet every possible requirement on the part of the solicitors.

Most of the other clauses in the Bill were agreed to, and the committee then considered certain new clauses relating to salaries to official assignees and others, and the Bill then passed through committee.

RECOVERY OF DEBTS BILL.

PUBLIC CHARITIES.

Mr. HARDCASTLE, in moving the second reading of the Public Charities Bill, stated that its main object was to provide a more convenient and less expensive mode of appointing trustees of public charities. Instead of the present methods, the Bill enacted that when any vacancy occurred in the trust of a charity the vacancy shall be filled up by election; a certificate of that election shall be drawn up by the chairman, and attested by two witnesses within three months; this certificate shall be presented to the judge of the county court of the district, and within one month thereafter the judge shall give a certificate as a confirmation of the election. Having noticed some of the inconveniences of the present modes of appointment, and explained the minor provisions of the Bill, he moved the second reading.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that great care was requisite in dealing with a subject of this kind, or they might augment inconveniences instead of diminishing them. Giving every credit to the hon. gentleman for his intention in proposing this measure, he could not agree with any one provision in it. In the first place, in cases where a trustee might be elected, the Bill provided that the certificate of such election should be drawn up by the chairman of the meeting, who was required to swear to all the particulars contained in it. He would be a very bold chairman who would do that. Then the certificate of election was to be lodged with the judge of the county court, who was thereon to issue another certificate in confirmation of the election; this certificate, when signed by the judge, and sealed with the seal of the Court and duly registered, was, by the Bill, to be thenceforth received, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, as full and conclusive evidence of the truth of all the facts, matters, and things respecting the charity contained in such certificate. Now, all facts regarding the title or the transmission of the title of the property of a trust required the utmost caution; and he thought the existing law had amply provided against such difficulties by the appointment of official trustees for public charities; and that provision of the existing law embraced every description of charity. The machinery of that law was of the simplest kind; the official trustees were made the legal custodes of the property of a trust, and the necessity for a continual conveyance and reconveyance of the estate was obviated. By investing the estate of a charity in these official trustees the evils complained of were avoided. But by the present Bill a little knot of men might come together and elect a person quite unqualified as a trustee, and the judge of the county court, who could have no information on the matter, except from the declaration of the chairman of the meeting, must confirm the election; and the certificate of the judge, who could know nothing, would become, not only the evidence of the qualification of the trustee, but of the ownership of the trust property. The present law did not require this kind of interference; he, therefore, could not consent to the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. HARDCASTLE, in consequence of the opposition of the Attorney-General, withdrew the motion.

Mr. HENLEY felt obliged to the Attorney-General for the clear manner in which he had pointed out the objection to the measure.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

Mr. SHERIDAN moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable cities, towns, and boroughs of 25,000 inhabitants and upwards to facilitate the appointment of stipendiary magistrates.

Leave given and Bill read a first time.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL (STAMP DUTY).

The House resolved into committee on this subject.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the following resolution:—

"That, in addition to the ordinary stamp duty, there shall be charged an ad valorem stamp duty of 7s. upon every £100 of property comprised in every trust or other deed or instrument required to be registered by any Act of the present session for amending the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency in England."

The resolution was, after some discussion, agreed to.

The House then resumed the consideration of the Bill as amended, and

An important amendment was made in the 82nd clause to the effect that before an adjudication in bankruptcy can be made against a non-trader debtor, he shall be served personally with a copy of the petition for adjudication unless the Court shall be satisfied that every reasonable effort had been made to effect personal service without avail when substituted service may be made under certain conditions.

On the motion of Mr. MALINS the 101st clause was struck out.

Clauses 207 to 218 (the Dead Men's Clauses) were, on the motion of Sir H. Cairns, struck out.

On the motion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL the Bill was re-committed, when further amendments were made and ordered to be reported.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

Friday, March 22.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL (STAMP DUTY).

The report of the committee on the resolution relative to the stamp duty was brought up.

After some observations from Mr. Crawford,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would move in committee the substitution of 5s. for 7s. upon every £100, as the latter amount was introduced by mistake.

The report was then agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The house then went into committee on this Bill, and it was ordered to be printed and read a third time on the 8th proximo.

The house then resumed.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

This Bill has been amended in committee in the House of Lords. Its provisions are as follows:—

1. No future deed or assurance for charitable uses to be void by reason of not being indented, or of specified stipulations for donor's benefit, or (as to copyholds) for want of deed.

2. Where charitable uses of any future deed or assurance are declared by any separate or other deed, the enrolment of such other deed to be requisite, and such deed to be void unless enrolled within six months.

3. No past deed or assurance for charitable uses upon valuable consideration shall be void if enrolled in chancery within twelve calendar months after passing of Act.

4. Where charitable uses of any past deed or assurance upon valuable consideration not enrolled are declared by any other deed, the enrolment of such other deed shall be sufficient. Where neither is enrolled, the enrolment of such other deed to be requisite, and if not enrolled within twelve calendar months after passing of this Act to be void.

5. Act not to invalidate certain deeds, nor to extend to deeds already avoided, or to pending suits. No deed, &c., thirty years old, nor any past deed where acknowledgment by the grantor cannot be obtained within twelve calendar months after the passing of the Act shall require acknowledgment prior to enrolment.

6. Act not to extend to Scotland or Ireland; nor to prejudice the two universities, or the colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster.

EQUITY.

EXECUTOR'S RIGHT TO INDEMNITY IN RESPECT OF TESTATOR'S LEASEHOLDS.

Bunting v. Marriott, M. R., 9 W. R. 264; Smith v. Smith, V. C. K., 9 W. R. 406.

In the case of Garratt v. Lancefield (2 Jur. N. S. 177), Vice-Chancellor Kindersley laid down several rules as to the right of an executor to indemnity in respect of his liability to the rent and covenants of leases held by the testator. He said that this being a continuing liability, the executor was entitled to indemnity out of the whole estate, whether the leaseholds had been specifically bequeathed, or formed part of the residue. If the specifically bequeathed leaseholds were themselves a sufficient indemnity, or if the specific legatee could give a sufficient indemnity, that would exonerate the rest of the property. But if the leasehold estate so specifically bequeathed was not sufficient, and the specific legatee himself would not, or could not, give sufficient indemnity, the specific bequest must be retained by way of indemnity; and if that was not sufficient, resort must be had to the general estate. But where the executor had unconditionally assented to a specific bequest of leaseholds, he had thereby deprived himself of the right of coming upon those specific leaseholds, and a fortiori of the right of coming upon the general estate, which could only stand behind the particular bequest. Even where the Court itself had directed parting with the property, whether by sale or by underlease, still the liability remained upon the executor, and his right to indemnity stood upon the same footing.

About a year after this case came that of Waller v. Barrett, before the Master of the Rolls (24 Beav. 413; s. c. 27 L. J., N. S., Ch. 214), in which a different view from that of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was enunciated with great distinctness. In that case the leasehold property of the testator had been sold under an order made in the cause. The chief clerk had certified that the covenants of the purchasers, with a bond from the persons beneficially entitled to the testator's personal estate, would be a sufficient indemnity against any contingent liabilities under the covenants. The Master of the Rolls held, in the first place, upon the facts of the case before him, that it was obviously for the interest of the ground landlord to proceed by ejectment against the person in possession, rather than by action upon the covenant; and he thought, therefore, that the proposed indemnity was sufficient. He then went on to show, from the authorities, that in the case of an existing debt, the executor is perfectly exonerated if he brings all the facts before the Court, and pays away the assets under its direction, and he added, "I am at a loss to conceive on what principle a debt which may arise hereafter, but which is not now existing, is to be treated on a different footing from an existing debt." After noticing the ancient practice of obliging legatees to give security to refund in case of the discovery of further debts, and observing that the same principle governed these cases of apprehended future liabilities on covenants in leases, he said, "it is called an indemnity to the executor, but if he has brought the facts before the Court I apprehend his indemnity is complete and perfect, so far as he is concerned, as he acts under the direction of the Court." According to the Master of the Rolls, the Court acts on the same principle with respect to non-existing debts which may hereafter arise, as it would in the case of existing debts not proved. "The indemnity given is only for the sake of effecting a security, in case the Court sees a reasonable probability that a creditor may afterwards come forward who is not now able to establish his case."

In the recent case of Smith v. Smith, Vice-Chancellor Kindersley appears to yield his former opinion to that of the Master of the Rolls. "Supposing there had been no dealing with the estate, were the executors entitled to any and what indemnity?" Following previous decisions, his Honour had formerly held that executors had such right; "but he now concurred with the Master of the Rolls, that where an executor fairly represented everything to the Court, the decree directing him to deal with the property must operate as an indemnity to him." The executor, therefore, did not need a pecuniary indemnity for his own protection; and the question was, whether such an indemnity ought to be given for the benefit of the persons who might take advantage of a breach of covenant? It appeared to his Honour "that the Court had in fact arrived at that point that the whole doctrine was set aside." But, supposing it still to subsist, a part of the doctrine was, that an executor by assenting to a specific bequest of leaseholds, lost his right to insist upon an indemnity, whether for his own benefit or for the benefit of the covenantor. Now, in the present case, the leaseholds were not specifically bequeathed, but they were given to trustees, who were also executors, upon certain trusts. His Honour held that when the executors as executors assigned to the trustees as trustees, which they had done, the effect was the same as that of assent to a specific legacy. The executors, therefore, were no longer in a position to claim indemnity; and even if they had been, the Vice-Chancellor appeared to think that he would have been bound to reject their claim.

Such a case as that of Waller v. Barrett would now of course be governed by the Law of Property Amendment Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 27, which provides that where an executor, liable as such to the covenants of a lease granted to his testator, shall have satisfied all liabilities already accrued thereunder, and shall have set apart a fund to answer any future claim in respect of any fixed sum covenanted to be laid out on the property, and shall have assigned the lease to a purchaser thereof, he shall be at liberty to distribute the residue, without appropriating any part thereof to meet any future liability under the said lease; and the executor so distributing the residue shall not, after having assigned the said lease, be personally liable in respect of any subsequent claim thereunder. But inasmuch as this enactment only extends to cases where the executor "has assigned the lease to a purchaser thereof," all cases of specific or residuary bequests of leaseholds appear to be left under the old law. In reference to such cases, the argument of the Master of the Rolls, that an executor is sufficiently indemnified if he acts under the order of the Court, is of quite as much importance now as on the day it was delivered. We understand Vice-Chancellor Kindersley now to adopt this argument, and to withdraw the opposite opinion which he had expressed in Garratt v. Lancefield. But when he goes on to say that the whole of this doctrine as to providing indemnities, whether for the benefit of the executor or of the covenantor, is set aside, we feel some doubt whether there is authority to support so broad a statement. Certainly the Master of the Rolls did not go so far in Waller v. Barrett. It is quite true that in King v. Mallcott, 9 Hare 692, Vice-Chancellor Wigram dismissed a claim by a lessor seeking to have an indemnity fund provided for him; so that it seems to come to this, that the executor, acting under the authority of the Court, does not want indemnity, and if the lessor asks for it he will not get it. Nevertheless, some attention may still be due to the words of Sir James Wigram in Fletcher v. Stevenson, 3 Hare 360:—"In considering what degree of protection is due to the absent covenantor, I am bound to consider whether the Court, taking the fund out of the hands of the executor, can do less than it would expect the executor to do, if the fund remained in his hands." If such considerations as here indicated still deserve attention, it seems premature to say that the whole doctrine founded on them has been set aside.

In the case of Bunting v. Marriott a petition was presented by residuary legatees, for the payment out of court of a fund which had, by an order dated 16th of April, 1857, been set apart to indemnify the executor in respect of his testator's leaseholds, which had been assigned to purchasers. The Master of the Rolls admitted that this case was within the Law of Property Amendment Act; but he refused to part with the fund without the consent of the ground landlord. Adhering to previously-expressed opinions, he said that such a fund was not set apart for the indemnity of the executor, because the order of the Court was an indemnity to him, but for the benefit of persons who might have claims on the estate; and, therefore, these persons must have notice before the fund could be parted with. His Honour "did not think that the meaning of the Act was to enable the parties in all cases like the present, where an indemnity fund had been set apart, to come and ask to have that indemnity fund paid out of court."

In the case of Dodson v. Sammel (8 W. R. 252), Vice-Chancellor Kindersley held that the Act did not apply to an indemnity fund created before the passing of the Act, nor even to a liability existing before it passed. He admitted in Smith v. Smith, that he had been wrong in thus narrowing the operation of the Act. It is remarkable that in Dodson v. Sammel, the leaseholds had not been assigned to a purchaser, but to the residuary legatee, and, therefore, the case did not come within the scope of the Act. Thus, it would seem that the decision in that case was right, although it was put on a wrong ground.

COMMON LAW.

MASTER AND SERVANTS ACT (4 GEO. 4, C. 34)—TO WHAT EMPLOYMENTS IT APPLIES.

Davies v. Berwick, Q. B., 9 W. R. 334.

This was a case for the opinion of the Court as to the validity of a conviction under 4 Geo. 4, c. 34. The 3rd section of that Act enacts, among other things, that if any "servant in husbandry, or any artificer, calico printer, handicraftsman, miner, collier, keelman, pitman, glassman, potter, labourer, or other person," shall, after entering into service, neglect to fulfil his contract in that behalf, or be guilty of any other misconduct or misdemeanour in the execution thereof, he may be convicted before a magistrate and punished as the Act sets forth. In reference to this provision there are a variety of decisions in the books, as to what species of employments fall within one or other of the several classes specified as above. Thus it has been held (though, perhaps, an express decision upon that point was hardly required, the general rules for the construction of statutes being borne in mind), that the words "other person" concluding the list, must be taken to refer to some business analogous to those previously enumerated (Ex parte Ormrod, 1 D. & L. 825); though, in the same case, it was also held that in order to justify a committal it is sufficient if an employment and service be mentioned in the warrant such as comes under the provision, without stating under what class of employments mentioned there it came. It has also been settled that domestic servants are not within this Act any more than they are within a previous Act on the subject (5 Eliz. c. 4), from which they are expressly excluded (Kitchen v. Shaw, 6 A. & E. 729). Though, on the other hand, in one of the most recent of the cases on the Masters and Servants Act which turned upon the kinds of employment coming under the provision, it was held that a contract between a journeyman tailor and his employer, though a "tailor" is not mentioned in the Act, is yet within its equity (Ex parte Gordon, 25 L. J., M. C., 12). The main ground of that decision was, that the person convicted had contracted to work on the premises of his employer, and for him only, until the work he had undertaken was done; and it seems, perhaps, a little difficult to distinguish from this last case the present one. For here a man was engaged to work upon a farm, his duty being to keep the accounts, to weigh out food for the cattle, to lend a hand to anything, and in particular to carry out the orders of his master; and yet it was held that such employment did not come within the Act—for that, on the one hand, the person convicted was not a mere "servant in husbandry" (but rather a steward); nor, on the other, did he fulfil the duties of any of the particular kinds of "artificers" specified in the Act.

LAW OF ARBITRATION—FIXING FEE IN THE AWARD, EFFECT OF.

In the matter of an Arbitration between Parkinson and Smith, B. C., 9 W. R. 340.

What is the effect of an award containing a direction that a specific sum of money be paid for the fees incident to the arbitration? Such is the question discussed in the present case, but with no very useful result, as far as the decision itself is concerned; for it avoids the main question, and serves chiefly to expose a curious contrariety of opinions on certain points between the authorities.

The question resolves itself into these considerations—1. Does the insertion of such a direction invalidate the award? 2. If not, does it affect the award in any other way?

As to the first of these points, it was held in Re Combs (4 Exch. 839), that in the absence of a specific power to that effect contained in the submission, the arbitration fees cannot form part of the award; though, in Threlfall v. Fanshawe (19 L. J., Q. B., 334), it was held, notwithstanding this ruling, that the arbitrator might name his costs in the award. But this last case was the decision of a single judge only sitting in the Bail Court, and is at variance with the views of the full Court in the subsequent case of Fernley v. Branson (20 L. J., Q. B., 178), where it was not only held that the ordinary practice of abstaining from naming in the award itself the precise fee which the maker of it is to receive, is the correct one; but that where one of the parties, in order to obtain possession of the award, is obliged to pay an exorbitant fee named in the award, he may recover back the excess as money had and received to his use by the arbitrator.

Moreover, in Roberts v. Eberhardt (3 C. B., N. S., 482), the latest case on the subject, the law, as laid down by the Court of Exchequer in Re Combs, appears to have been taken for granted by most of the judges, and is expressly recognised by several—among others, by Mr. Justice Wightman. The balance of authorities, therefore, is clearly greatly in favour of its being improper to name the fee in the award itself (though it may be remarked that Mr. Justice Blackburn, in Fernley v. Branson, intimated his adherence to the contrary principle, on which Threlfall v. Fanshawe was decided); but, supposing it to be improper, does the direction invalidate the rest of the award? Clearly not; according to the judgment of some of the judges in Roberts v. Eberhardt (see in particular, per Wightman, J., p. 521); and the opinion of Blackburn, J., in the present case, commenting upon Strutt v. Rogers (7 Taunt. 212), is to the same effect.

It results, therefore, that an award is probably not invalidated by a direction therein contained concerning the arbitrator's fees; but, on the other hand, it seems that the Courts will not enforce such an award by rule in the exercise of their summary jurisdiction. They will leave the party seeking to enforce it, to his remedy by action. In the present case they contented themselves with discharging a rule nisi, which had been obtained to enforce the offending award—thus leaving the question of its validity or invalidity, by reason of such blemish, still, to a certain extent, an open one.

PRACTICE—SECURITY FOR COSTS—FOREIGN PLAINTIFF.

Nylander v. Barnes, Exch., 9 W. R. 339.

The general practice as to when a litigant will be compelled to give to the opposite party security for costs, is clear enough. If the plaintiff resides out of the jurisdiction of the court, or if a nominal plaintiff can be shown to be in extreme poverty, security will be ordered on the application of the defendant. But the courts will not interfere in this way on behalf of the plaintiff and make the defendant give security for the costs of the proceedings should he be unsuccessful. The question, however, which has usually arisen in these cases, is what facts are sufficient to establish that the plaintiff is "out of the jurisdiction;" for it is not every absence from the kingdom which will be a good foundation for the application. It must be shown that the circumstances of the case are such that a speedy return cannot reasonably be anticipated; and on this ground it was held in one case that a foreigner, captain of a ship, which was in the habit of plying between ports of this country could not be ordered to find security (Nelson v. Ogle, 2 Taunt. 253). It has indeed been suggested that the proper test is whether the party intends to be absent from the jurisdiction so long that he will not be ready to be apprehended at the time when execution may be taken out in the regular course of proceedings (See Lush's Pr. 2nd ed., p. 696). But in the present case (which much resembled Nelson v. Ogle, except that the ship as well as the master was foreign, which is left uncertain in the report of that case) it was decided that the plaintiff must find security on the more general ground that he was a foreigner not domiciled in this country, but domiciled rather in his ship and the foreign port to which that ship belonged. The court added some observations as to the extreme convenience of a uniform rule of practice in these and similar cases: and it may be remarked that henceforward the case of Nelson v. Ogle cannot be cited with any advantage; for though some attempt was made to reconcile it with the present decision on the ground that the ship did not appear to be a foreign one, it was replied with great force that by the then navigation laws a foreigner could not be master of a British ship, and that, therefore, there was every reason to presume that the ship of the plaintiff Nelson was foreign as well as himself.

THE COMMON LAW CHAMBERS.

I read in your columns during last long vacation an admirably sketched scheme for the amendment of the procedure at the Common Law Chambers. Why does not the Incorporated Law Society try to carry it out? The present system is a monstrous nuisance, which ought to be abated. Nothing can be more unlike judicial tribunals than these dens, and nothing can be more removed from the dignity or decency necessary to the due administration of justice than the scenes which are commonly to be witnessed there.

A SUFFERER.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

I am a copying clerk, who has been with his master 12 years. I have not neglected any opportunity of improvement, and my master has just offered me my articles. But I do not know Greek or German, and therefore I am told I cannot avail myself of his kind offer. A young gentleman fresh from school, who knows both, is about to be articulated. I know more law than he does, but I do not appear on that account to be so eligible to be admitted an attorney as that lucky youth. Is not this rather hard?

W. P. B.

The popular fallacy (as I venture to call it) of the present day in the legal world is the necessity of a classical education. A great many resolutely shut their eyes to the fact that hardly any articulated clerks now pay a premium. The day for that is gone by. Clerks now-a-days often get a salary. Can we therefore reasonably expect a knowledge of "Xenophon's Anabasis" "Schiller's Revolt of the Netherlands" &c., as proposed by the committee of the Incorporated Law Society in their report of the 12th February, as to which the opinion of the members has been requested? If we are to have such an absurdity as a classical education, surely it ought to be reduced to a minimum. Do pray, before it is too late, try to stop the ridiculous proceedings of gentlemen so utterly unacquainted with the true interests of the profession. Do they mean that there should be no clerks at all in future? B.

REVERSIONARY LEGACIES — PRACTICE AS TO SERVING EXECUTORS WITH NOTICE OF ASSIGNMENT.

Would any of your readers kindly state whether it is the usual practice of the profession to serve notices of assignment of reversionary legacies on those of the executors who have not proved the will, but to whom power to come in and prove is reserved. I have usually given notice to only the executors who have proved, but it is just possible that such a notice may be practically useless and unavailing to prevent the assignor obtaining payment or possession of the legacy from an executor taking probate after the death, or going abroad, of the executor to whom I gave my notice;—as such subsequently proving executor may have had no communication with his predecessor, nor possession of his papers, and would, I presume, be justified in paying the legacy to the assignor himself, whose receipt would be an effectual discharge, if the assignee, from not being aware of the falling into possession of the reversion, failed promptly to come forward to claim it. On the other hand, it is often troublesome, if not difficult, to trace the non-proving executors to whom power is reserved; and it would be very inconvenient for those parties themselves to be troubled with, and to have to understand and take care of, notices relating to an estate in which they suppose they have no concern. The difficulty, however, which I most strongly feel is the state and extent of the solicitor's liability to his client in such cases. Is the omission to serve notice on the non-proving executors such culpable negligence as to render him liable to his client, the assignee, in case the latter loses the fruits of his purchase or mortgage by reason of his solicitor's omission to give notice to a non-proving executor? In the event of a loss, the client would probably contend that, as the will disclosed the fact of there being other executors beyond those who have proved, and as the solicitor must be presumed to know the possible consequences of failure to affect them with notice, he ought to trace and serve them; notwithstanding the practical inutility and unnecessary expense of such a course in nine cases out of ten.

Possibly the usage of the profession might be to some extent regarded on the question of the solicitor's liability.

A SOLICITOR.

THE BANK OF ENGLAND AND IRISH PROBATES.

It occurs to me that you will not be unwilling to afford a small space in the Solicitors' Journal to bring before the profession generally what I conceive to be an arbitrary act on the part of the Bank of England as against executors acting under Irish probates.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 79, s. 95, it is enacted, that from and after the period at which this Act shall come into operation, when any probate or letters of administration to be granted by the Court of Probate in Ireland shall be produced to and a copy thereof deposited with the Registrars of the Court of Probate in England, such probate or letters of administration shall be sealed with the seal of the last mentioned court; and being duly stamped, shall be of the like force and effect, and have the same operation in England as if it had been originally granted by the Court of Probate in England. To obtain the seal of the Court of Probate in England to an Irish grant the registrars of the court require a certificate from the Inland Revenue that the full duty has been paid in the grant to cover the English as well as Irish property. In order to obtain such certificate, the Inland Revenue authorities require an affidavit from the executor showing the value of the Irish property, and of what it consists, and also the value of the English property, and its particulars. If the full duty has been paid on the entire property, and such duty is duly impressed in the grant, the Inland Revenue authorities then transmit a certificate to the registrars of the Court of Probate to that effect, which is deemed sufficient for the Court of Probate to affix its seal to the Irish grant. The grant, with the seal of the Court of Probate attached, is to all intents and purposes, an English grant or probate, and it is adopted as such by all her Majesty's courts of record, bodies corporate, bankers, railway companies, &c., but not by the Bank of England till after the Bank authorities are satisfied that the full duty has been paid to cover both Irish and English property, and it is in regard to this unnecessary and uncalled for interference on the part of the Bank of England that I have to complain and to call attention.

Having had occasion the other day to procure the seal of the Court of Probate in England to an Irish grant for the purpose of obtaining a transfer of some stock standing in the name of a testator in the books of the Bank of England, into the names of the executors, I took the Irish grant with the seal of the Court of Probate attached to the Will Office at the Bank and left it for registration in the usual way, claiming a certain amount of stock. After the lapse of two days I called for the probate, when I was informed that the claim was correct, but that before the transfer could be made the Bank required a certified office copy of the certificate from the Inland Revenue, filed at the principal registry of the Court of Probate, in order to satisfy the Bank that the proper duty had been paid on the English as well as the Irish property. I reflected for a short time and became convinced that the Bank was not justified in requiring such certificate, and that the Act of Parliament authorising the affixing of the English seal to an Irish probate, nor any other Act of Parliament, did not require the Bank of England to look after the revenue (unless, indeed, the Bank had been called upon to transfer a larger amount of stock than was warranted by the duty impressed on the probate); and I accordingly declined to procure such certificate, and intimated that the executors would hold the Bank responsible for any loss that might arise by reason of the non-transfer of the stock. I was then desired to see the chief accountant of the Bank on the subject; and that gentleman, after hearing my objection, referred me to Mr. Freshfield, the solicitor to the Bank; but I was unable to get an interview with him, and the matter stood over a few days for Mr. Freshfield to advise the Bank thereon. I believe that Mr. Freshfield immediately put himself in communication with the authorities of the Inland Revenue, who reported to him what was required by them before a certificate was issued to the registrar of the Court of Probate. I afterwards saw the chief accountant, who informed me that Mr. Freshfield had reported to the Bank, and advised that the certificate could not be dispensed with, and, therefore, unless such certificate was obtained, the transfer of the stock would not be made to the executors. Under these circumstances, and particularly as the probate was required in Ireland, and the fund to be dealt with, I had no alternative but to procure a certified office copy of the certificate from the principal registry of the Court of Probate, and for which I paid 6s.; and I need not say that for attendances to bespeak the office copy and afterwards calling for, and lodging it at the Bank of England entails an unnecessary expense on executors; and I submit that it is most unreasonable of the Bank to subject any party to this expense, particularly when the Bank authorities are fully aware of the means adopted by the Inland Revenue itself, to protect itself against imposition; and the Bank authorities are equally well aware of the means adopted by the registrar of the Court of Probate to avoid imposition and to justify them in affixing the seal of that honourable court to the Irish grant. Upon the knowledge of these facts, I say it is unjustifiable of the Bank to drive parties to this expense and trouble. I must confess I cannot understand why the Bank of England do not require a certificate that the full duty has been paid on an English probate, if it be necessary to do so upon a probate obtained in Ireland with the English seal affixed.

I shall be glad if any of your readers, or even Mr. Freshfield himself, can clearly point out under what Act of Parliament, or under what circumstances, the Bank can incur any responsibility by waiving this certified office copy certificate, and thereby adopting the seal of the Court of Probate attached to an Irish grant, equal and as effective to all intents and purposes as an English probate.

THE NEW LAW LIST.

SIR,—On referring to the Law List just published I find that my name is improperly inserted as "Yew." This will certainly cause me serious inconvenience, and may do me great injury. I have complained at the publishers, who lay the blame at Somerset House.

Is there any remedy in such a case? By bringing this before your readers you will greatly oblige,

Yours obediently,

THOMAS YEO.

ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE.

At the monthly meeting of the Dublin "Statistical Society" on Monday last, some points connected with the administration of criminal justice ably introduced in a paper by Mr. R. W. McDonnell, barrister-at-law, came under discussion, in such a manner as to show that the Irish method of conducting prosecutions, although far in advance of that in England, is still far from having reached perfection. Some day or other, after the fifteen or twenty years of deliberation considered necessary in England before any extensive improvement in the law can be effected, prosecutions will, doubtless, be no longer left to private enterprise, but will be conducted by the responsible agents of the Crown. In the meantime, the experiment has been for some time tried here not without success; and the imperfections at which we are about to glance are such as may be readily corrected. It is hardly necessary to premise that prosecutions in Ireland are conducted by solicitors appointed by the Crown, who are remunerated partly by salary and partly by fees. Formerly there was a Crown solicitor for the whole of the circuit; but on any vacancy now occurring, the much more satisfactory plan is followed of appointing a Crown solicitor for each county. When the case for the Crown is complete, and the Attorney-General has (on copies of depositions laid before him for that purpose) directed a prosecution, the briefs are given out to the Crown prosecutors, or counsel who have the privilege of conducting Crown cases in the county. These counsel (two or three in number) are paid entirely by fees, and receive their appointments, which are permanent ones, from the Attorney-General, whose deputies they are considered to be. The number of Crown counsel employed depends, of course, on the nature of the case, and the Crown solicitor brings in the law officers, or one of them, "special," in a case of great moment, as in the late Orange trials in the North. The smaller offenders are tried at Quarter Sessions; and, with that unnecessary multiplication of offices for which this country is remarkable, there is a distinct class of solicitors practising at sessions, who conduct these prosecutions. The latter altogether are, we believe, resident in the counties, whereas the Crown solicitors proper, who are often leading men in the profession, and regard the appointment as a mere appanage to their practice, too often reside in the metropolis, and leave most of the Crown business to the management of a clerk. This is the weak point of the system, a system which is excellent in theory, and which might easily be rendered so in practice, were greater care exercised in the selection of practitioners resident in the several localities as Crown solicitors. The particular evil pointed out by Mr. McDonnell, and recognized by all who took part in this discussion, was the want of acquaintance with the characters, &c., of the witnesses for the Crown, which very frequently leads Crown solicitors, ignorant of the locality and of its inhabitants, to delegate the "getting up" of the case to the constabulary. The constables, who are generally anxious enough to show their zeal, bring forward as much evidence as they can manage to accumulate, without that careful sifting of the good from the bad for which training of another kind is of course indispensable. Hence it frequently happens that a prosecution framed and supported by the police, breaks down because one witness, and perhaps not a very material one, is "damaged" on cross-examination; and the jury, not apt to discriminate so nicely as to reject part of the evidence and give its due weight to the residue, rush to the conclusion that the case for the Crown has broken down, and give their verdict accordingly. Since writing the above, an illustration has occurred of the too prevalent delegation of these duties to the police, in the course of a trial before the chief justice at the Kildare assizes of some soldiers for a robbery of bank post bills. We copy from the Express. A banker's clerk is being examined as to the consecutive dates and numbers of bills issued by him:—

"Mr. Kelly, Crown prosecutor, here said he would put all the bank post bills into the witness's hand, and call for them accordingly.

"The Head-Constable here began to look for the post-bills and had some delay in getting them.

"CHIEF JUSTICE—Where is the attorney that has the conduct of the case? It is the duty of the police to catch the thief, and not to conduct the prosecution.

"Mr. Curran, counsel for prisoners.—The police always conduct the prosecution."

The result too frequently is, that the case is mismanaged, and that the prisoner's attorney, who knows the locality and knows something about all the Crown witnesses, has a very decided advantage over the Crown solicitor, who supplements his very limited knowledge by the unskilled zeal of the constabulary. Mr. McDonnell suggests that to the attorney who represents the Crown at quarter sessions should also be delegated the management of the cases tried at the assizes; but we cannot assent to the principle involved in compelling an inferior officer in one department to undertake the work of a superior officer in another, who from absence and want of knowledge cannot efficiently perform his own duties. It would, we consider, be the better remedy to consolidate the two offices in the person of one attorney resident in the county.

Connected with this subject is the inquiry, how far the high military discipline of the constabulary force has promoted or interfered with its efficiency as a force, having for its object the prevention and detection of crime? Many persons are beginning to think that the constabulary, brilliant on parade, and drilled up to the highest point, the admiration of strangers, is not exactly fitted for its real work, and fails to trace crime as a less showy and more unumilitary force might be expected to do. In any given town or village the constabulary will be found, perfect in drill and appearance, occupying with dignity its own barrack, not mixing with the populace, and to all intents and purposes—though not in name—a military force. Observers do not fail to connect this fact with another—that a very large proportion of the worst offenders against life and property remain undiscovered and unpunished.

We pass over some other matters which formed subjects for remark at the meeting referred to. The mischiefs arising from the want of intelligence in jurymen, for example, cannot be remedied by legislation, or by any change that either the legislator or the administrator can effect. We must trust to time and the spread of education to enlarge the class from which intelligent jurors are to be taken. The old complaint of the unequal distribution of punishment re-appeared, and not without reason. Jones receives four years of penal servitude for some small theft, while Brown escapes with three months' imprisonment, although convicted of having nearly killed his wife. This complaint is, at least, as old as the ancient proverb, that "one man may steal a horse, while another may not look over the hedge;" so mellifluously paraphrased by the author of "Fine English" in the last Cornhill Magazine. Possibly, if all the crimes, with their corresponding sentences, that occur in the annals of the several circuits were recorded by some central authority, or written in the statistical books of a Redgrave, and printed copies furnished periodically to all the assize-going judges, such information and comparison might do much towards equalising the rates of punishment, and usefully aid in steadying the scales of justice.

THE CIRCUITS—PRIVILEGE OF THE BAR.

All the circuits are now progressing, not without some little contests of the accustomed kind between attorneys and the bar as to the right of the former to examine witnesses. In one of these cases, the judge (on the remonstrance of the members of the bar present), refused to allow an attorney to act in any way in court for a defendant who had not instructed counsel; but the point was, at the instance of the latter, reserved, and will be brought before the full Court at the beginning of term. It will be very advantageous to all parties to have this often-disputed point finally settled. It appears that some of the judges have admitted the right of an attorney to examine witnesses (though not to address the jury), while other judges have upheld to the full extent the alleged privileges of the bar.

THELWALL v. YELVERTON.

There is no doubt whatever as to the intention of the defendant to apply to set aside the verdict obtained against him in this famous case. Many lawyers are of opinion that the Chief-Justice misdirected the jury on two very material points.

First, it is considered that the marriage in Scotland (assuming it to have taken place at all) was not regarded by the lady when she went through the ceremony as a final, conclusive, and binding marriage, but that she at the time intended to supplement and ratify it by another marriage under the sanction of religion; and that the judge ought to have told the jury that it was no legal marriage, unless regarded at the time as final and conclusive to all intents. Secondly, it is considered by many that the law required Major Yelverton (by baptism and education undoubtedly a Protestant), to have recanted and openly professed the Roman Catholic faith for twelve months prior to the marriage by the priest at Rostrevor; and that the judge ought to have directed the jury accordingly, instead of directing them to find that he was a Roman Catholic, unless any open profession of Protestantism could be proved to have been made by him within the twelve months. On these two points of law, or on either of them, the whole subject may very possibly be re-opened. In any event the mode selected of trying the important questions at issue, was an unsuitable one, and seems but to open up a long avenue of litigation.

THE ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT OF THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

The Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association have addressed a memorial to the Commissioners for inquiring into the constitution of the Accountant General's department of the Court of Chancery, and the provisions for the custody and management of the funds of the Court.

After some preliminary statements, it proceeds to state:—

PART I.

That in 1848 the Association prepared and presented to the then Lord Chancellor, the late Lord Cottenham, a very elaborate memorial, in which the following amendments were, among others since effected, suggested with reference to the banking department of the Court of Chancery. To dispense, as is done by the Accountant General in bankruptcy, with powers of attorney, and to require the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery to act on letters or such other authority as may be sufficient in law to bar the party, the solicitor of the party verifying such authority. According to the present practice there is no evidence given to the Accountant General that the person signing the power is the party entitled to receive the money under the order; to allow money to be paid into court (as courts of law do) without any order, and also to be invested as is now done with money paid in under the Legacy Act; to have the orders on which the Accountant General acts, or an office copy of them, filed with him; to get a branch of the Bank of England established in Chancery-lane for the convenience of the suitors, in the same way as has been done at the Court of Bankruptcy.

The memorial then refers to the report of the House of Commons Select Committee on fees (1848), and proceeds to recommend that the system of brokerage on suitors' funds be discontinued, and that the Accountant General be paid by a salary, and that only the balance of the stock required to be bought or sold in each day be bought or sold by the broker, and that the one-eighth per cent. on the funds transferred thereby saved to the suitor, and which, but for this alteration would have been actually bought and sold, should be paid to the Suitors Fee Fund for the benefit of the suitors, and that a percentage should be charged instead of fees on all money transactions.

The memorial then states as follows:—In 1852 the association petitioned Parliament to abolish the Accountant General's office, and to substitute a branch of the Bank of England in Chancery-lane, through which the Court of Chancery should pay the suitors as the Government does the public creditors.

On September 16th, 1852, the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association memorialized the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury as to the staff of this office. In the same year the Incorporated Law Society appointed a numerous committee of the solicitors most experienced in equity practice, twenty-nine of whom representing, by their proper and agency business, perhaps half the suits in the Court of Chancery, signed a report on the whole subject of equity reform, which was printed by the House of Commons, on the motion of Sir James Graham (Parliamentary Paper, House of Commons, 1852, No. 216).

As regards this office, they suggested among other reforms since effected, that the slave compensation system of orders should be adopted. That affidavits of calculation be abolished; that powers of attorney be dispensed with; that money be paid into court without order, and invested without requests every half-year; that all orders on which Accountant General acts should be filed in his office; and that a branch Bank of England should be established in Chancery-lane. In 1853, on March 31st, the association wrote to the Lord Chancellor, enclosing a copy of their petition to the House of Commons in 1852, and again recommending the abolition of this office, and representing the inadequacy of the staff. The reply of the Lord Chancellor's secretary stated that the whole subject was under consideration.

In 1853 the association again petitioned Parliament to abolish the Accountant General's office. In 1854, the association reported that they were convinced the only sound principle was to do away with the office altogether. From the year 1853 to 1856, the consideration of the reform of the Court of Chancery was much removed from the action of the Legislature by the existence of the Chancery Commission, on which not one single solicitor, or officer of the court who had been a solicitor, was appointed, although the Lord Chancellor was memorialized to take that step. The existence of this commission, so constituted, materially deadened the efforts of the solicitors for several years. In 1856, in the third report of the Chancery Commission, the Accountant General's office was only incidentally touched on, viz., as to the proposed abolition of the counter signature of cheques by the registrar (which abolition both registrars and many solicitors had advocated), but which was reported against by the commission (see p. 12, Report, &c., Accountant General's Letter, p. 210). In 1857, in July, the Incorporated Law Society's Equity Committee made a report, of which they sent a copy to the Lord Chancellor, commenting inter alia as to this office; on the insufficient attendance, and on the time taken in operations, especially in cases of sales or transfers of stock, preparing drafts, and making out powers of attorney; and again recommended that the whole establishment should be converted into a branch of the Bank of England.

PART II.

The memorial suggests the following points in the present system, as those which call most loudly for alteration and amendment:—

1. There is no officer whose duty it is to see that suitors are not taxed beyond what is actually required, while the existence of the profit funds of the report of the concentration of courts and offices commissioners, called funds B and D, and the fact that they had been permitted to accumulate to such an enormous sum as one million and a half, instead of having been used for the benefit of the suitors of the past generations during which they were accumulated, shows the urgent need of frequent periodical overhauling. Thus in 1852, fees producing say £50,000 a year were taken off, which might have been long before remitted; and there is now a considerable cash balance arising from surplus fees levied.

2. By selling or purchasing the balance only of stock required on any particular day, the chief part of the double one-eighth to the stock-jobber on the entire sales and purchases, which, with brokerage, probably now amounts to £20,000 a year, might be saved. The present practice in this respect was (mainly on the evidence of solicitors) reported against by the House of Commons select committee on fees in 1849, but it has, nevertheless, been continued ever since.

3. The Bank of England is paid by a £300,000 balance (see Mr. Parkinson's evidence in report of the Concentration of Courts Commissioners last year); but there is no one to see from time to time that it does not exceed that sum. It was above £698,000 in 1859.

4. The great inconvenience caused to suitors—

1. From having to go to two places for their money.
2. From having to wait five days for the completion of every sale, and payment of money.
3. From so many months' holiday per annum being taken.
4. From there being no staff to meet the times of pressure before vacation.

5. The following particular details also occasion unnecessary expense:—

1. The keeping of two sets of books and clerks, and all the accounts in duplicate.
2. The requiring powers of attorney, instead of mere letters, to take out the cheques, which are all payable on the mere endorsement of the party.
3. Affidavits of calculations.
4. Registrars giving directions or certificates for sales, and countersigning cheques for interest after the first payment, in which last case, no order being required to be produced to them, their countersigning has become a mere valueless ceremony. Their countersignature of drafts for principal monies occasions much inconvenience and expense. It may be true that it operates as a check on the Accountant-General, but it might be dispensed with, and some less inconvenient plan substituted.

5. The absence of an office reference to the record.

PART III.

The memorial states that the whole question of legal finance is so bound up with that of the taxation of the suitor, that it is quite impossible to give due consideration to the one subject without entering on that of the other. Thus the House of Commons committee in 1848, which was appointed only on the fee question, found itself obliged to go into the two subjects, and examined the broker and chief clerk of the Accountant-General (Messrs. Mortimer and Parkinson), and it is hoped that the terms and constitution of the present commission may be extended to the consideration of legal finance, and the taxation of the suitor generally in all the courts of England, in order that this very important subject may be investigated in the most comprehensive manner.

All courts more or less require a banker, and your memorialists are of opinion that there should be, as far as possible, one joint banking department for all the courts of justice, both superior and inferior, including the Court of Bankruptcy. This ought to be a source of profit, and its accounts should be annually overhauled and audited by some responsible officer. At this banking department a State deposit account might be also instituted where money, under the control of any court for too short a period to make an investment in stock prudent, might be made productive, though the rate of interest might justly be very low, only just sufficient to give a profit. Suitors might be left the option of depositing their money here, or investing in stock. Of course, as long as fees are taken from suitors, all banking profit should go to aid the suitors. But the principle laid down in 1849 by the House of Commons select committee on fees, of taxing monetary steps by way of per centage (which would be the practical effect of their present proposal), should be the governing one, as it gets away from the unjust poll-tax system, and puts the incidence of the tax where it ought to be, on property. And if that principle be adopted, then the profit of such banking will go for the benefit of the suitors paying such per centage. At present there is no uniformity of principle in assessing or levying fees, or in seeing that they are duly accounted for. The Common Law Procedure Acts have all passed since the report of 1849, and yet no provision for collection by stamps is made in them. In the common law courts there are rather above one hundred persons who collect fees as stewards for the Treasury without any efficient check; and no means exist of detecting defaulters in these courts, or in the local and county courts. Under these circumstances, inquiries should be made into—

The whole system of collecting fees, the existing arrangements, and the most desirable way of providing for the custody, paying in and out of court, and investing of the funds of suitors in all courts, whether of law, equity, bankruptcy, admiralty, probate, or county courts in England and Wales. And that some competent officer should be appointed to superintend the banking department, so as to insure the realization of as large a profit as possible therefrom.

The best mode of auditing the accounts of all officers and agents employed, and of securing and auditing the accounts of all fees levied on suitors for the maintenance of courts, officers, salaries, &c., and of bringing the whole subject annually under direct Parliament control.

The memorial contains copious extracts from the documents to which it refers.

The memorial, therefore, asks that the commissioners may receive the evidence which members of the association, as practising solicitors, are able to give upon a subject with the details of which they are so intimately acquainted, and which so materially affects the interests of their clients the suitors.

SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW.

I imagine that I have now said quite enough to show that the argument of "unfairness," as urged against the proposed change, is simply ridiculous. Indeed, that argument, when rightly understood, is in favour of the change. The existing law is defective in not showing sufficient forbearance towards prisoners, inasmuch as it closes their mouths, and permits them to be convicted on evidence which they might disapprove or satisfactorily explain if they were enabled to give testimony. Let us imagine the case of an innocent man charged with the commission of a crime—would not he be anxious to tell his own story to the jury, and would not his examination tend materially to establish his innocence? These questions can only be answered in the affirmative. Then the law which precludes him from tendering himself as a witness was not made for his benefit. But it was made, we are told, for the benefit of prisoners. Then it must have been made for the benefit of the guilty. But is it just or wise that the innocent should be exposed to the danger of a wrongful conviction in order that the guilty should have no temptation to utter falsehood, and should escape the possibility of any hostile presumption being raised against them in consequence of their silence?

Having now answered all the objections that I have known urged against the proposed change, and having shown that that change would be a substantial boon to all innocent prisoners, I wish to say a few words respecting some special evils that arise from the existing law. And first it must be borne in mind that several large classes of injuries, as for example, assaults, slanders, and frauds, may be dealt with either civilly or criminally. If an action be brought in any of these cases, the defendant can be examined as a witness, but if he be indicted or be summoned before the magistrate, his mouth is closed. His accuser in the one case may give testimony without fear of contradiction, but in the other he must speak in the presence of a man who can, very possibly, expose his exaggeration, disprove his statements, or even turn the tables upon himself. It is obvious that such a law not only gives a very unfair advantage to an accuser who proceeds criminally, but it has a natural tendency to promote prosecutions where actions would otherwise afford a preferable remedy. This view of the operation of the law will probably account for the remarkable fact, that actions for assault are very seldom tried in our county courts, but that complainants in these cases almost invariably proceed either by summons before the justices or by indictment. Magistrates and juries are thus often placed in a very embarrassing position. They are required to adjudicate when, in the event of the defendant being unable to call any witness, they have only heard one side, and this in the face of the legal maxim, which directs them "audire alteram partem." I am assured by one of the ablest of the metropolitan magistrates (Mr. Tyrwhitt, in his letter to the Law Amendment Society on this subject) that through fear of being misled by this partial law, he sometimes feels justified in declining to pronounce any decision. "In assaults," says he, "it often happens that the party alleging himself to be injured is the only witness. It is common to dismiss the summons, and drive the complainant to sue in the county courts, so as to let in the defendant to be examined on oath." Language more condemnatory of the law could scarcely be used, but language as condemnatory was recently used by Chief Justice Erle. (R. v. Goss, and R. v. Ragg, 29 Law Jour., Mag. Cas., 86, 90.) The point under discussion was to fix the true line between what is, and what is not, an indictable false pretence; an important question, as bearing upon the fraudulent statements by which certain tradesmen have of late years been enabled to palm off spurious articles upon the unwary. After stating that, to constitute a false pretence, there must be a false representation knowingly made respecting an alleged matter of definite fact, his lordship went on to observe, that if the term "false pretence" were rendered more comprehensive, "a purchaser who by his negligence had made a bad bargain, and who wished to get rid of it, might have recourse to an indictment, where the vendor's mouth would be closed, instead of being obliged to bring an action where each party could be heard on equal terms." Now I have no wish to quarrel with the learned judge's definition of a "false pretence;" but I feel that I am entitled to question the argument contained in this passage, or rather the wisdom of the law which could alone justify such an argument. Surely the criminality of any act or statement alleged to be fraudulent, and our right to punish it, ought to depend upon the real character of that act or statement, and not upon the facility of proving it, or the difficulty of disproving it. Probably the learned judge would himself, upon reflection, be the first to recognise the justice of this criticism; but he was obviously oppressed by the feeling that the law which shuts a defendant's mouth is an unfair law, and he could not help recollecting, to use his own language, "how extremely calamitous it would be for a respectable man to have an indictment of this sort brought against him."

In prosecutions for conspiracy, riot, and other cognate offences, in the commission of which several persons may have been more or less engaged, the present law has a tendency to promote a very mischievous and oppressive practice, that is, the practice of including in the indictment more persons than the ends of justice require. As no defendant can make a statement on oath, the net is spread as wide as possible, so as to shut the mouths of the greatest number of witnesses. The prosecutor by these means is saved from the danger of contradiction, the real defendants are deprived of valuable testimony, and men, who perhaps have slightly transgressed the law, but who never ought to have been exposed to any criminal proceedings, are involved with their more guilty comrades in one common ruin.

Another evil caused by the present law is, that it occasionally furnishes an opportunity for a criminal to escape. This happens thus—the prisoner makes a statement, plausible in itself, but capable of being exposed as false by cross-examination. As he is not sworn, he is not cross-examined. The judge leaves the statement to the jury, cautioning them against believing it, as it was not made on oath, or tested by cross-examination. The jury consider these are unfair reasons to urge, when the man was not permitted either to be sworn or to be cross-examined, and, acting upon the statement, they acquit the prisoner.

It must further be borne in mind, that the law which prohibits a prisoner from giving testimony, is not only unjust towards him in the event of his being innocent, but it is unfair towards the jury who are required to pronounce a verdict when they know that, very possibly, they may not have heard "the whole truth." In important cases, where the life of the accused is at stake, or where, from the secret nature of the charge, disinterested eye-witnesses can seldom be called to confirm or contradict the testimony of the accuser, the fact that the jury are forced by law to decide on what is practically an ex parte statement, cannot fail to oppress them with a heavy sense of responsibility. To a conscientious man the task of sitting as a jurymen in a criminal court must ever cause much anxiety, and it is the duty of the Legislature to diminish that anxiety as far as possible. Now, I am persuaded that nothing would so materially produce this effect as a law which would enable the jury to hear everything that could be said on both sides.

Passing now to the second question which I invite the society to discuss—I mean the question whether prisoners ought not to be empowered to call their wives or husbands as witnesses—I do not deem it necessary to dwell on this subject at any length. All the arguments in favour of permitting prisoners themselves to testify on oath apply with redoubled force to their wives or husbands; and the objections, such as they are, which are urged against the adoption of the first proposition, have, comparatively speaking, little bearing on the second. By the present law, if a wife is injured by her husband, she may indict him for the injury, and give evidence against him. Nay, he may be convicted on her sole, uncorroborated, testimony. In civil suits the husband and wife may be examined as witnesses either for or against each other, and in suits between strangers they may be called on opposite sides, and may point blank contradict each other. In the face, then, of such laws, I am unable to discover any sound reason for rejecting the testimony of a wife when called by her husband to disprove a charge which he is required to meet in a criminal court. She might, no doubt, in some cases be tempted to commit perjury in the hope of screening a guilty husband; but the question is, whether this evil is at all comparable to that which results from withholding her testimony, when she can speak to facts which may establish her husband's innocence. To my mind this question can only be answered in one way; and it appears to me that a law which prevents a wife from aiding her husband when wrongfully accused, can be described in no other language than as a monstrous injustice.

It remains for me only to observe, that our illustrious president Lord Brougham, with that enlightened spirit which has made him, αὐτὸς ὁ νόμος, the pioneer of law reform, has on three several occasions—(in the session of 1858, 1859, and 1860, when his lordship brought in Bills to remedy the evils of the existing law, not one of which was quite satisfactory; for all of them omit to notice offences punishable on summary conviction, and offences against the revenue, and they all permit the wives of persons to testify at their own option, and not at the option of their husbands, and some other defects might be pointed out in these Bills, though substantially they are right.)—brought this subject more or less prominently under the notice of the House of Lords. That he has not hitherto met with success is a matter of no surprise, for the change is undoubtedly one of some magnitude, and the arguments in favour of it have not, until very recently, attracted the attention of the public. Even now much misapprehension as to the real merits of the measure prevails in certain quarters, and we have no right to expect that the doubts respecting its expediency should be cleared up until the subject has undergone a thorough discussion. In the hope of promoting such a discussion, I have drawn up this paper, and I leave the matter with much confidence in the hands of the society.

PROMOTION AT THE BAR.

The petition to the Crown, mentioned in the letter of Mr. Edward Webster, which appeared in the columns of this journal last week, was presented by him in his private capacity, and not as a member of the bar. As the subject is one of much importance, we devote some space to Mr. Webster's statement, which, moreover, is not without interest, in itself.

It referred to a schedule, signed by Mr. E. Webster, stating the reasons on which it was founded, and which we are enabled to give at length. The petitioner prayed the Crown to direct the attention of its responsible advisers to the effect on the Crown, the suitor, and the bar, of the present system of promotion at the bars of England and Ireland, respectively. The petition has been presented.

The schedule is as follows:—

1. Although your petitioner has never had a large professional business, he has within the last five and twenty years, advised and conducted to a successful issue some of the most important and difficult suits that have ever been instituted in the High Court of Chancery, and is, therefore, fully competent to form a judgment upon the subject of the foregoing petition.

2. The bars of England and Ireland are now divided into two sections, called respectively the inner bar and the outer bar.

3. The inner bar is composed of the forensic law officers of the Crown, serjeants at law, counsel called to the council of the Crown, and doctors of law being advocates, and counsel having patents of precedence.

4. The outer bar consists of all other barristers.

5. The inner bar is higher in rank than the outer bar, and sits in court within a barrier of its own, from which the outer barrister is excluded.

6. Until a comparatively recent period in the history of England, the bar of England consisted of the forensic law officers of the Crown, serjeants at law, and doctors of law, being advocates who were honorary members of the bar, and other barristers, but, except in the Court of Common Pleas, in which the serjeants at law had a monopoly of the business, there were in all the other courts of law and equity no exclusive privileges whatever, save a right of pre-audience and a right to a seat in court according to the rank or standing of each barrister. Since about the year 1668, and more especially of late years, it has been customary for the Crown to confer by letters patent in England and Ireland, but not in Scotland, on barristers selected for the purpose from time to time by the Lord Chancellor, a right of pre-audience over other barristers.

7. The barristers so selected become the sworn, and were formerly the salaried servants of the Crown, and cannot without special leave be employed against the Crown. They are termed "King's Counsel," or "Queen's Counsel," according to the sex of the sovereign for the time being, and become members of the inner bar.

8. The loyalty of the outer bar to the Crown does not depend on the expectation of the preferment so bestowed.

9. The Lord Chancellor in making such selection is liable to err, and, consequently, several barristers have of late years been raised from the outer bar to the rank of Queen's Counsel, who afterwards have not been much employed or have not been at all employed in their profession.

10. The actual services of barristers raised to the rank of Queen's Counsel are very rarely indeed, if ever, required by the Crown, hence their office or duties are for the most part nominal.

11. Nevertheless, whilst the Crown obtains no solid advantages from the right of pre-audience so conferred, such right operates, as hereinafter appears, very injuriously to the suitor, and with much injustice against members of the bar of ordinary talent and acquirements, who are not so fortunate as to obtain from the Lord Chancellor the favour of being placed within the inner bar, and to whom such advancement in their profession is necessary.

12. The fees given to the counsel of the inner bar are larger than those given to counsel of the outer bar, although the briefs given to each counsel are always the same in quantity and quality, and although the outer barrister when employed with a Queen's Counsel may be a better lawyer, a better speaker, and may have more knowledge of his client's case.

13. Solicitors ordinarily consider it their duty to employ a leading counsel chosen from the inner bar.

14. Consequently, a monopoly of the most lucrative professional business is practically enjoyed by the inner bar, which species of monopoly does not exist in any other calling by which your Majesty's subjects maintain themselves by labour, do it labour of mind or of body.

15. Such monopoly operates injuriously to the public welfare, as it largely increases the cost of proceedings to the suitor, and in fact compels solicitors to give leading business to a certain class of barristers instead of having the whole bar to choose from.

16. Such monopoly oftentimes operates very injuriously to those barristers who are not so fortunate as to be selected by the Lord Chancellor, as it frequently deprives them of the opportunity of having that beneficial business which in the course of their profession they would otherwise have.

17. The amount of business whilst at the outer bar and the probable fitness of the candidate are usually, but by no means invariably, regarded by the Lord Chancellor when selecting barristers for the rank of Queen's counsel, and occasionally of late years the Lord Chancellors have called members of the outer bar to the inner bar for reasons entirely extra-forensic.

18. The quantity of business at the outer bar is no certain or even probable test of the qualifications of a barrister to conduct leading business when within the inner bar, inasmuch as a barrister may be an indifferent lawyer yet an attractive and successful advocate, an indifferent advocate yet an excellent judge, an excellent lawyer and pleader and yet utterly inefficient as a leading counsel.

19. The letters patent having no supernatural operation, the learning and ability of the barrister to whom they are granted remains precisely the same as it was before he obtained them, and the only professional advantage he derives from them is that he becomes a candidate supposed to be qualified for the lucrative business monopolised by the inner bar; but as there must always be an equal amount of learning and ability at the outer and the inner bar, it follows, that to the extent to which leading business is monopolised by the inner bar, the learning and ability of the outer bar is displaced and has no action, and is utterly unproductive, although the outer barrister is equally able and justly entitled to exercise the learning and ability so displaced, and cannot be deprived of that right without a flagrant violation of natural justice.

20. So far as the interests of the Crown are concerned, your petitioner verily believes that the monopoly of leading business which it confers on certain members of the bar is injurious, such monopoly being opposed to the principles of free competition on which the Legislature has acted of late years.

21. Moreover, from the errors of selection made by Lord Chancellors, the office of Queen's counsel is getting into disrepute; and your petitioner, in a periodical representing the most advanced and most scientific views of the legal profession in matters connected with the amendment of the law, and which was published a few years ago, finds it described as a "Mock Dignity" (vide 14 vol. Law Review, p. 314), an expression which has not the approbation of your petitioner.

22. The Crown must always have great and legitimate influence over the bar, as members of the bar must be selected for judicial appointments.

23. The petitioner in presenting the foregoing petition is actuated by no other feeling than this—viz. he verily believes that for the sake of the Crown, the suitor, and the bar, the utmost competition ought to exist at the bar, and that no exclusive professional privileges ought to be conferred on any barrister, save only the ordinary law officers of the Crown appointed to protect the interests of the Crown, and that the distinction between "the inner bar" and "the outer bar" ought to be abolished.

24. If the bar were one and entire, and the Crown were to confer on barristers of extraordinary learning and forensic ability an order of honour, but without any exclusive privileges, and the Crown were to appoint a limited number of barristers as assistants or advocate deputies to the Advocate-General, the Attorney-General, and the Solicitor-General respectively, but without any exclusive privileges, and the Crown had also power to retain as occasion should require, but not permanently, the services of any other barrister, the Crown would be sufficiently protected and the bar would be relieved from all cause of complaint arising from the unavoidable errors made from time to time by the Lord Chancellor for the time being in selecting or not selecting from the outer bar candidates for the rank of Queen's counsel.

Law Students' Journal.

EASTER TERM EXAMINATION.

The examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys have appointed Tuesday, the 30th April, and Wednesday, the 1st May next, at half-past nine in the forenoon, at the hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely, and close at four o'clock each day.

Articles of clerkship and assignment, if any, with answers to the questions as to due service, according to the regulations approved by the judges, must be left with the secretary, R. Maugham, Esq., on or before Monday, the 22nd April.*

Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the Term, the candidate may be examined conditionally, but the articles must be left within the first seven days of Term, and answers up to that time. If part of the term has been served with a barrister, special pleader, or London agent, answers to the questions must be obtained from them as to the time served with each respectively.

On the first day of examination papers will be delivered to each candidate containing questions to be answered in writing, classed under the several heads of—1. Preliminary. 2. Common and Statute Law, and Practice of the Courts. 3. Conveyancing.

On the second day, further papers will be delivered to each candidate containing questions to be answered.—4. Equity, and Practice of the Courts. 5. Bankruptcy and Practice of the Courts. 6. Criminal Law, and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace.

Each candidate is required to answer all the preliminary questions (No. 1.); and also to answer in three of the other heads of inquiry, viz.:—Common Law, Conveyancing, and Equity. The examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in bankruptcy and in criminal law and proceedings before justices of the peace, in order that candidates who have given their attention to these subjects, may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

In case the testimonials were deposited in a former term, they should be re-entered, and the answers completed to the time appointed.

THE ORIGINAL SCHEME.

CLASS A. OF THE LIFE ASSOCIATION OF SCOTLAND will be closed on 5th APRIL NEXT, for the 22nd Annual Balance; and a special advantage will be secured by Entrants before that date.

Under this Scheme the Association has been eminently successful in reducing the expense of Life Assurance.

In consequence of Allocation of Profits the Policy-holders of the 1st series have for many years been required to pay only 12s. 6d. (instead of 20s.) per £1 of their Premiums, that is, £6 5s. instead of £10—£9 7s. 6d. instead of £15, &c.

Under the HALF-CREDIT SYSTEM also One-half of the first Six Years' Premiums may be left unpaid as long as the Policy-holder pleases.

Farther, the policies will, in most cases, be relieved on application after Five Years, of all conditions as to Residence, Occupation, &c.

Applications should be lodged on or before 5th April.

A Medical Officer in attendance daily at half-past 12 o'clock.

THOS. FRASER, Res. Secy.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The "Non-trader" and "Dead Men's" Clauses of the Bankruptcy Bill have afforded, as might have been expected, the main grounds of opposition to it. The greatest difficulty, however, was anticipated from the former, and it has been overcome by yielding to the suggestions of Sir Hugh Cairns for the protection of persons who are not engaged in trade, but who are intended to be subjected to the operation of the Act. The "Dead Men's" Clauses have been very wisely struck out of the Bill altogether. They were introduced at the dictation of the mercantile classes, who can hardly be supposed to know what the real effect would have been. The principal clause proposed that creditors of deceased "trader-debtors" might petition the Court of Bankruptcy for a distribution of the estate of the deceased. And it was afterwards provided that no order should be made where a suit for the same purposes had been instituted in Chancery. Application was to be made within three months after the decease of the debtor by any creditor of such an amount as would have entitled him to petition for an adjudication in bankruptcy; and in effect, as Sir Hugh Cairns remarked, persons would always be liable after their death to have the stigma of insolvency attached to their names, without any fault of their own. The jurisdiction thus sought to be given to the new Court of Bankruptcy was altogether foreign to its proper functions, and, moreover, involved the great evil of a new conflict of jurisdictions. We are glad, therefore, that these objectionable clauses have been struck out of the Bill.

THE CASE OF BROOK v. BROOK.

Perhaps we may venture to describe this case by saying of it, in the words of Lord St. Leonards, that it is one of great importance but of little difficulty. It arose, as is well known, out of an attempt to evade a law which still remains unrepealed in spite of persevering agitation. The party which is active in demanding the repeal of the law against marriage with a deceased wife's sister, would be equally interested in contriving a process of easy application by which that law might be evaded; and, therefore, we may suppose that the decision of the House of Lords on Monday week, was awaited with an anxiety which spread far beyond the persons immediately concerned in the litigation.

Professional readers may have felt an additional interest in this case, because it was an appeal from what was substantially the first judgment given by Sir Cresswell Cresswell, in the character of a judge peculiarly conversant with matrimonial law. On the 4th of December, 1857, after the establishment, but before the opening, of the Divorce Court, Sir C. Cresswell, who was still a judge of the Court of Common Pleas, delivered his opinion as assessor to Vice-Chancellor Stuart in the case of Brook v. Brook, then pending in the Court of Chancery. That opinion was adverse to the validity of the disputed marriage, and to the legitimacy of the children born of it. The Vice-Chancellor gave judgment in accordance with the opinion of his assessor, and the party asserting the validity of the marriage appealed directly to the House of Lords. The case has been fully argued by able counsel before the Lord Chancellor and three other distinguished lawyers, and the hope of getting rid of this much-discussed portion of the marriage law by the device of a continental trip may now be finally laid aside. Probably this failure on the judicial side of Parliament will produce increased activity in the Legislature. The question can henceforward be discussed only under those aspects of it which lie beyond the province of this Journal. The existing law of England, as declared by the House of Lords, holds that marriage with a deceased wife's sister is contrary to the Divine law, and it refuses to allow its own domiciled subjects, standing in that relation of affinity, to contract marriage even in a country where such marriages are held lawful. It is true that there is a rule of international law which says that a marriage valid according to the law of the country where it is celebrated is valid everywhere. But this rule must be understood to speak only of the forms of entering into the marriage contract. An example of its application may be found in what used to be called Gretna-green marriages, which were contracted in Scotland between domiciled English subjects, without the forms of banns or license required by the English law. Those marriages were held valid, because the forms of the country where the contract was made had been complied with. But what the Lord Chancellor called "the essentials of the contract" depend upon the law of the domicile of the contracting parties, and that law must hold the contract void if it be found defective in these essentials. Perhaps the term "essentials" is not very happily selected to meet all the questions which exercise the ingenuity of the student of this branch of law. There is, for example, the question which came before Sir C. Cresswell in the late case of Simonin v. Malac, as to the validity of a marriage solemnized in England between persons who, being of an age which by our law enjoys complete freedom of matrimonial engagement, were, nevertheless, required by the law of France to obtain, or at least to apply for, the consent of parents. It is easy to say that the defect existing in that case by the French law was merely a defect of form; but it is quite as easy to represent it as a defect of substance, and we cannot doubt that it would be so regarded by a French court. The Lord Chancellor in his recent judgment said that "it was quite obvious that no civilised state could allow its domiciled subjects or citizens by making a temporary visit to a foreign country to enter into a contract to be performed in the place of domicile, if the contract is forbidden by the law of the place of domicile as contrary to religion, morality, or any of its fundamental institutions." The principle here laid down is quite sufficient to dispose of Brook v. Brook, because there is no doubt that by the existing law of England marriage with a deceased wife's sister is forbidden as contrary to religion. But such a law as that of France, which requires consent of parents to marriage under a certain age, seems to come very near to what we should call "a fundamental institution," if it were an institution of our own country. Probably there are many persons who think that the prevention of early marriages without the consent of parents deserves to be regarded as matter of public policy, quite as much as the prohibition of marriage with the sister of a deceased wife. The decision in Simonin v. Malac is, perhaps, open to more doubt than that in Brook v. Brook; and, at any rate, the comparison of the two cases suggests this remark, that what is called the comity of nations does not usually prevent each nation from treating its own laws and policy as much more important than those of all the world besides. In giving judgment in Simonin v. Malac, the Court inquired how an English clergyman when called upon to perform the marriage service could be expected to discover that the applicants were the subjects of a law which prescribed certain consents of parents or other formalities as necessary to a valid marriage. Surely it might be asked with almost equal reason why a Danish clergyman should be required to find out that the parties coming before him stood in a certain relation which, by the law of England, made a marriage between them null and void.

The decision of the House of Lords went upon the ground that, before the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, the marriage in question would have been held illegal, and might have been set aside, in a suit commenced in England in the lifetime of the parties. The effect of that Act was to make all such marriages as would have been voidable before it passed absolutely void. But in considering whether any particular marriage would have been voidable before that Act, reference is necessarily had to the legislative declaration of the prohibited degrees of affinity and consanguinity which was made at the Reformation. It is important to bear in mind that Lord Lyndhurst's Act has no further effect than we have here ascribed to it. In the words of the Lord Chancellor, "this Act was not brought in to prohibit a man from marrying his former wife's sister, and it does not render any marriage illegal in England which was not illegal before." It will be remembered that in the present case both the contracting parties are dead; and the question arises between the Crown and the surviving children both of the first and second marriages as to the succession to the share of a deceased child of the second marriage in the real and personal property of the father. The words of the Act may now be taken to embrace all marriages of this class, contracted in all parts of the world, by persons domiciled in England or Ireland. Speaking popularly, no Englishman can run over to the Continent, go through the ceremony of marriage with his deceased wife's sister, and bring her home with him as his lawful wife. This seems to be the whole effect of the decision of the House of Lords. The opinion of Sir C. Cresswell was rested upon the ground of the incestuous character of such marriages in the eye of the English law, and also upon the further ground that Lord Lyndhurst's Act created a personal disability, which followed Englishmen like their shadows into whatever part of the world they might betake themselves. But this latter doctrine has been rather anxiously repudiated by the House of Lords, and probably it would not be difficult to show that it might lead to doubtful, and perhaps inconvenient, consequences. Lord Cranworth noticed that one of the questions raised in the case had been, whether this Act applied to all British subjects in all parts of the world; and he declared his own view to be that it applied only to persons domiciled in England and Ireland. Of course domicile may be changed without throwing off allegiance, and this notion of a personal disability created by the Act would appear to enlarge its operation, so as to comprise all subjects of the British crown.

The unfortunate effect of this judgment in bastardizing the innocent children of Mr. Brook will bring home very strongly to the popular mind the truth that legal principles and decided cases are not to be got rid of by agitation. The judgment of the Lord Chancellor is intelligible to the lay reader as well as satisfactory to the lawyer. It is at any rate sufficient to dispose of the case before him, and perhaps none the less valuable because it declines to adopt Sir C. Cresswell's refinement of a personal disability. It seems that the appellant's counsel addressed themselves with a good deal of vigorous confidence to the demolition of that subtle theory. Perhaps they may have had reason for the hopes which this part of their case inspired in them; but if they had, this only shows that the best lawyers may sometimes give unsound reasons for perfectly sound judgments.

THE NEW LAW EXAMINATIONS.

For some weeks past our columns have contained numerous letters on the subject of the proposed preliminary and intermediate examinations at the Law Institution. As might have been expected beforehand, there is a great diversity of opinion on the subject. But, except amongst the "ten years' clerks," there appears to be a very general conviction on the part of our correspondents in favour of the institution of compulsory examinations, both preliminary and intermediate, as a test of fitness and proficiency in candidates for admission into the profession. No doubt there is great force in the complaints made by some of our correspondents who desire to avail themselves of the ten years' clause. Many of them who are unquestionably men well fitted to undertake the duties of the profession, and to assume a highly respectable position as members of society, may, nevertheless, find it extremely difficult to pass such an examination as would be very proper for lads who had just left school. Indeed, it is obvious to every person who is qualified to form an opinion on the subject, that a difference of ten or fifteen years in point of age, is of itself a very important element in considering what ought to be the test of intellectual capacity or acquirements. It will not be denied that many men a few years after they take their Master's degree at the University, would find it a very irksome task, without considerable preparation, to pass some of the examinations which presented no great difficulty to them years before. It is, moreover, too much to expect that examiners will not sometimes lean towards severity where candidates are very much beyond the average age. If, indeed, the examination was confined to questions in which the results of experience could be exhibited, it would not be unreasonable to expect from persons of mature age more than from mere boys; but when it is of a character altogether favourable to the latter, this circumstance is one that ought not to be forgotten. In reference to the present occasion it should, also, be borne in mind, that any plan which is adopted may, unless special care be taken, have an unfair retrospective effect so far as the ten years' clerks are concerned. We, therefore, suggest to the Incorporated Law Society, whether it would not be fair towards the "ten years' clerks," to make, at least for some time, a difference between the examinations to be passed by them and those which are prescribed for the general body of articulated clerks. It is at present proposed that every candidate must pass in Latin, and either Greek, French, German, mathematics or physics. Such a scheme must in effect exclude not a few respectable men who have been many years away from school and engaged in the practice of the law, but who are by their character and general attainments well qualified for the profession. We suggest then that in the case of "ten years' clerks" there should be an option of being examined in moral philosophy and political economy in place of the subjects which we have mentioned. Ethics and economics belong to the same general division of philosophy as jurisprudence. They can both be studied from text books in the English language; they comprise a domain of knowledge as profitable to the lawyer as they are interesting in themselves; and they are admirably adapted to prepare the minds of men who have not been much accustomed to scholastic training for an accurate and systematic study of law. The great advantage that would thus be gained would be in the fact, not only that such knowledge might be acquired by men of mature age at intervals of leisure, and without irksome cramming, but that it would remain to those who had gained it an important and permanent acquisition. Whether, indeed, all candidates might not be allowed to elect as one subject of examination, logic, metaphysics, ethics or political economy, is a question well worthy of consideration. At Dublin University, where for some years past all these subjects have received great prominence, it is observed that a large proportion of the men who become distinguished at the bar have selected for their final Honour Examination—in other words, they have "gone out" in—the Moral Sciences. Of these, the names of Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Justice Willes, and, if we mistake not, of Mr. Justice Keating, may be mentioned as being best known in England. The "Novum Organum," and other works of Lord Bacon, the treatises of Dugald Stewart, Dr. Thomas Brown, Victor Cousin, and such like authors among the moderns, to say nothing of the greater names of antiquity, constitute, undoubtedly, the best possible preparation for perusing even the technical books of English law. It is not to be expected, however, that ten years' clerks could do more than acquaint themselves with the most elementary works on the subjects to which we have referred—e.g., Dugald Stewart's "Outlines of Moral Philosophy;" Adam Smith's or Sir J. Macintosh's "Ethical Histories;" Thomas Brown's smaller work on "Mental Physiology;" and Archbishop Whateley's "Lectures on Political Economy." All these works are within the ability of any person of tolerable capacity and education; and we think our readers will agree that even a slight acquaintance with the subjects treated by the authors in question would be much more valuable than such a smattering of Latin and Greek as could be obtained from professional crammers by men who have no time, and, probably, no disposition, for anything else than cramming.

Having thus explicitly stated our views, it is hardly necessary for us to say how entirely we agree with the spirit of the suggestions made by Mr. Blyth to the Incorporated Law Society, which were published in this Journal a fortnight ago. In the same number Mr. Sidney Gedge, who is entitled to speak with some authority upon the subject on which he writes, presents to the Council of the Society some formidable objections against the recognition of the "Middle Class Examinations;" and we confess that his reasons appear to our minds to be well-nigh conclusive. We understand that the entire subject is still under the consideration of the Incorporated Law Society, and we have no doubt that the many valuable suggestions which have been made by our numerous correspondents will receive due attention from that body.

VIII. (Continued.)

In my last article I was considering the various authorities referred to in the case of Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 379. Upon these citations of cases, and texts of authors, Sir John Leach decided in favour of an acquired domicil in India, and it may not, perhaps, be irrelevant in this place to consider certain expressions in this judgment which have been made the ground of argument in favour of intention merely being sufficient to constitute a new domicil, or to let in the domicil of origin. At this distance of time it is difficult to say whether the judgment is a verbatim report of what actually fell from the learned judge; the case is otherwise most elaborately and carefully reported, and hence, perhaps, it would not be just to call that fact in question; but, if it is the sense only of what was delivered, that circumstance might account for an apparent inconsistency, attempted, with considerable acumen, to be reconciled by another learned judge now on the bench. The passage is this:—"A domicil cannot be lost by mere abandonment. It is not to be defeated animo merely, but animo et facto, and necessarily remains until a subsequent domicil be acquired, unless the party die in itinere toward an intended domicil." Now, certainly, this appears to involve a perfect contradiction, that is to say, that a domicil necessarily remained, until a new one was acquired animo et facto, unless the party died in itinere, towards an intended domicil; that is, unless he did an act which his Honour had just said could not constitute a domicil. These words the learned judge last referred to thought applied to the abandonment and not the acquirement. Another view, however, might be taken of them, and perhaps supported by the judgment as a whole. In the subsequent words, his Honour observes upon the fact that the intention to return to Scotland was not supported by the evidence, and hence, it may fairly be assumed that, if the evidence had been sufficient, the starting on the journey toward an intended domicil, and that domicil the domicil of origin or birth, might have had the effect of causing such domicil to revert (the other and acquired domicil having been abandoned) by starting for another country; and this is somewhat supported by the fact that the whole judgment seems based upon the defect of evidence.

Upon the subject of revival of a domicil of origin there was some discussion in the case of Hoskins v. Matthews, which occurred in January, 1856, before the Lords Justices on Appeal, from Vice-Chancellor Wood, 4 W. R. 216; in which a residence abroad from ill-health was considered not to be of such a compulsory nature as to prevent the acquirement of a foreign domicil; but the most important part of the case consisted in an observation of Lord Justice Turner, who, after stating the fact that the domicil of origin being English had been lost, and a new one acquired in Sweden, Spain and Portugal, thought, there was yet enough to show that this new domicil was again lost, and the original domicil revived. The case was, that subsequently the testator went to Florence, where he made his will and died, and the Vice-Chancellor decided that his domicil was Tuscan, in which Lord Justice Turner concurred; but Lord Justice Knight Bruce, thought that the English domicil remained during the year, when Lord Justice Turner held it had revived, or at all events, that a Tuscan domicil was not acquired; but the opinion of one of their lordships being the same as that of the Vice-Chancellor, the result was that the appeal was dismissed.

Upon the question of reverter, it therefore appears that much more is assumed than actually laid down or decided; and the following proposition may now, I think, be taken to be the law upon the point; namely, that a man must ex necessitate rei be taken to have some domicil; and, therefore, supposing that during his life he acquires many, and absolutely abandons and loses them, his native domicil, or domicil of origin or birth, will revive; but only in this way, that there must still be some act on the part of the person to complete the intention that it shall revive; but that in the case of a domicil of origin, a slighter degree of evidence is necessary, a slighter degree of factum to support such evidence than in the case of any other species of domicil. That a domicil of origin subsists ipso facto, whereas any other species must be acquired by some act; and, lastly, that a domicil of origin cannot revive or revert by the mere intention that it shall do so, which is, in fact, a corollary from the first proposition.

In the case of MacDaniel v. King, 5 Cushing (American reports) 472—3, the argument was that residence was something different from, and something less than domicil; if this was so under some circumstances, (was observed by the Court) and in connection with a particular subject, or particular words which might tend to fix its meaning; yet in general, residence and domicil were regarded as nearly equivalent; and there seemed to be no reason for making the distinction. The question of residence or domicil was one of fact, and often a very difficult one; not because the principle upon which it depended was not very clear; but on account of the infinite variety of circumstances bearing upon it, scarcely one of which could be considered as a decisive test. The principle seemed to be well settled, that every person must have a domicile, and he could have but one domicile for one purpose; at the same time, it followed of course, that he retained one until he acquired another, and that acquiring another, eo instanti, and by that act he lost his next previous one. The actual change of one's residence and the taking up a residence elsewhere, without any intention of returning, is one strong indication of change of domicile. The actual removal of a person from another place to this, leaving his family therein, but with no intention of returning, was a change of domicile.

In the case of Hoskins v. Matthews, 20 Jur. 110, which I have already mentioned, and shall have occasion hereafter more particularly to refer to, it was laid down, as I have said, as an axiom by Lord Justice Turner, that a domicile of origin after it has been lost, revives more easily than an acquired domicile; thus establishing the position that, whatever domicile a man acquires, or indeed, whatever number of domiciles, if he successively loses them all, the domicile of origin, although lost twenty deep, would revive, supposing it was clear that the party at the time of his death had no other. It might, perhaps, be somewhat difficult to put such a case, but we might easily imagine that the movements of the individual might, from choice or circumstances, be so varied and unsettled from the time of attaining majority until death, as that no domicile whatever was acquired, and this alone would raise such a case as to come within the principle I have adverted to. With regard to the animus remanendi, the following remarks of Lord Fullerton in the case of The Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Gordon's executors, 12 Dec. of Court of Sess.; 2 Ser. p. 657, are somewhat in point. "If, in order to constitute a domicile there were required an animus remanendi so permanent and so absolute as to be independent of all possible change of circumstances, I do not understand how, in the constant uncertainty and transition of all sublunary events, a domicile ever could be established. I think, on the contrary, that the domicile is entirely independent of the motive by which the party was influenced in adopting it. If the motive was one which naturally led to a permanent residence, and if under the influence of that motive, the party did act, the animus is sufficiently established, and the presumption cannot be taken off by the mere possibility, or even the probability, that but for the existence of the inducement the party might have established himself elsewhere." The same learned judge in the case of Arnott v. Groom, 9 Dec. of Court of Sess. 2nd series, p. 142, (and therefore, on a previous date) made some very pertinent remarks upon the cases of Somerville v. Somerville, and the case of Dr. Munroe (Munroe v. Douglas) where it was held that because he (Dr. Munroe) had not fixed on any other domicile, although it was not pretended that he had not left India permanently, India was his domicile at the time of his death. Cases might be conceived, he said, involving questions of domicile, in which this principle would lead to strange conclusions, but as limited to the law of intestate succession, it was, perhaps, not very unreasonable. A man having the power of disposing of his property as he chose, and the act of the law being, as it were, the substitute for any expression of his intention on the subject; the change of domicile truly operated as an alteration of his implied will, and there might be some reason for holding that nothing should be held so to operate short of a clear, and definite, and complete purpose to fix himself in some other country, where a different law on the subject was in force. The above dicta, as far as they go, are in favour of the reverter of the domicile of origin, and upon the principles regulating this subject, certainly the case of Munroe v. Douglas went as far as it is possible to conceive the law could be carried. There was an absolute and entire abandonment of the residence in India, the only qualification upon that being that it was not absolutely completed by an acquisition of a new domicile, and the mere progress towards such an end was not thought sufficient to complete the abandonment. But, Lord Fullerton, as above, expressed grave doubts upon the soundness of the rule, and those doubts, are, I think, entitled to great weight; for there scarcely appears any reason where there is a total abandonment, not to hold that the domicile of origin would revive, and be the domicile where a party dies in itinere.

EQUITY.

ASSIGNMENT OF STOCK IN TRADE BY INSOLVENT TRADER.

The Oriental Bank v. Coleman, V. C. S., 9 W. R. 432.

The case of Ex parte Bailey (3 D. M. & G., 534), supplies a good illustration of the principles on which assignments by traders are held void as against assignees in bankruptcy, as tending to defeat or delay creditors. In that case a trader, when insolvent and subject to two judgments, conveyed and assigned to a creditor real property encumbered to its full value, certain policies of assurance, and all his credits, together with his books of account (being all his property, except his furniture and stock in trade) by way of mortgage, to secure the debt due to the creditor. Executions had been issued on the judgments and the furniture and stock in trade were seized under them two days after the assignment. The trader became bankrupt, and it was held that the assignment was void as against his assignees. The deed had been obtained under a degree of pressure which put fraudulent preference out of the question, but it was contended that the deed was void, as contrary to the policy of the Bankrupt Act. There was some doubt whether, at the time he executed the deed, the bankrupt was aware of the issuing of the writs of fi. fa.; but he must have known that they might issue at any moment; and however that might be, Lord Justice Knight Bruce thought the execution of the deed, and the delivery of the bankrupt's books to the creditor's solicitor, were "acts of the bankrupt inconsistent with the rational possibility of a continuance of his trade after that day." The deed and the delivery of the books must be taken as parts of the same transaction, by which all chance of the bankrupt continuing in trade, "fairly or substantially, or otherwise than colourably," was destroyed. In answer to the argument that, inasmuch as a substantial part of the bankrupt's estate was left out of the deed, the case did not fall within the principle of the decisions as to assignments of the entire estate, Lord Justice Turner remarked that the true question in that case is, "whether there is such an assignment as prevents the trade being carried on in the usual and ordinary course?"

On the very day that the above case came before the Lords Justices, the Court of Exchequer Chamber was occupied with the case of Smith v. Cannan (2 Ell. & Bl. 35). In that case G., a farmer, conveyed all his farming stock and goods to S. by bill of sale by way of security for about £900, with a power of sale. The property comprised in the bill of sale was of about the value of £2,800, and there was a trust for G. of the surplus. The bill of sale comprehended the whole of G.'s property except two shares in a joint-stock bank of the value of £17 10s. each. S. seized and sold enough of the stock to pay the amount secured to him. G. was afterwards declared a bankrupt as a banker in respect of the before-mentioned shares. The bill of sale was bond fide given under pressure, and of course the trade of the bank was in no degree affected by the giving of it. On these facts the assignees of G. were held entitled to recover against S. the value of the stock seized by him. It was laid down by the Court that the necessary consequence of an assignment of what is substantially all the trader's property, is to delay his creditors, and that the existence of a resulting trust, and of a substantial surplus, does not prevent its having that effect; and, further, that a conveyance necessarily delaying a trader's creditors is an act of bankruptcy, though it has not the effect of stopping his trade. It was said by Baron Parke that the test to be applied in such a case is "not whether the necessary effect of the deed is to stop the trade, but whether its necessary effect is to delay the creditors of the trader." It was a remarkable feature of that case that the property conveyed by way of security exceeded by two-thirds the value of the liabilities for which it was pledged, and that there was an express trust of the surplus for the assignor. The Court held that these facts made no difference. Chief Justice Jervis said: "The whole property is conveyed and put out of the immediate reach of the trader and of his creditors. The fact that there is a substantial surplus may prevent the deed from ultimately defeating the creditors; but it does delay them, for they are deprived of the power of taking that surplus under a fi. fa."

The authorities on this subject, of which the two above noticed are among the most recent, have been lately brought under the consideration of Vice-Chancellor Stuart in the case of The Oriental Bank v. Coleman, which arose out of the complicated affairs of the estate of the notorious Colonel Waugh. There had already been a suit of Jolly v. Arbuthnot, 7 W. R. 127, 532, in which the question was between a mortgagee of Waugh's estate of Branksea, and his assignees in bankruptcy, as to the validity of a power of distress contained in the mortgage deed. That question was decided by the Lord Chancellor in favour of the mortgagee, reversing the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The question in the present case arose between the Oriental Bank, as transferee of the securities held by the London and Eastern Bank, and the assignees of Waugh, and related to the validity of a bill of sale given by Waugh to the latter bank, comprising all the furniture, effects, goods, chattels, and other things in Branksea Castle, or the island of Branksea, where Waugh lived and carried on extensive pottery works. A portion of the property comprised in this bill of sale had been already taken under the distress put in by the mortgagee, and now the Vice-Chancellor's decision gives the remainder to the assignees in bankruptcy. The trade in respect of which Waugh was adjudicated a bankrupt was this pottery business, carried on at Branksea. Vice-Chancellor Stuart said that "a long course of decisions had established this—that if a trader is made a bankrupt, and before bankruptcy, being in insolvent circumstances, has assigned all the stock in trade by which he was enabled to carry on his business, that assignment is fraudulent in the eye of the law, and is an act of bankruptcy in itself." In this case the Court considered that the insolvency was clearly proved, and the bill of sale was therefore declared void. It is to be observed on this decision that it was alleged by the plaintiffs that at the time of giving the bill of sale Waugh possessed other property than that included in it. The Vice-Chancellor does not appear to have noticed this allegation in his judgment, but if it was supported by the evidence, it seems to give the case a different aspect from those we have above stated, in both of which there was substantially nothing left in the trader after the assignment. It is quite true that in Ex parte Bailey, the Court said that the question was, whether the assignment prevented the trade being carried on in the usual way? and it would seem that an assignment of all the effects at the pottery works would have this effect. Nevertheless, if a case should arise of an assignment by an insolvent trader of his stock in trade, he having at the time other substantial property, it is possible that such a case would still admit of a good deal of argument, as may be seen by reference to the case of Hale v. Alnutt, 18 C. B. 505, which is even more recent than Ex parte Bailey. In that case A., a licensed victualler, was indebted to B in £570 for goods sold and money advanced. Being pressed for payment, as an inducement for forbearance on the part of B., A. executed a deed whereby he mortgaged to him the public-house in which the business was carried on, and assigned to him all his trade and other fixtures and household furniture, other than his stock-in-trade, with a power of sale. The value of the property mortgaged was between £300 and £400, and the value of A.'s assets at the time was about £1,200. It was held that this deed was not an act of bankruptcy. To this authority may be added the words of Chief Baron Pollock in Young v. Waud, 8 Exch. 221: "If a man's business be that of a carrier, and he sells his horse and cart, but has ample funds to buy another horse and cart, such an assignment is no act of bankruptcy."

It should be observed that, according to the report, the Vice-Chancellor did not state quite accurately the circumstances of the case of Smith v. Cannan. The bankrupt in that case had not "reserved a substantial surplus of his property in his possession." He had assigned everything he possessed except the two bank shares; and the value of the property thus assigned was thrice the amount of the debt intended to be secured, so that after satisfying that debt, there would have remained in the hands of the assignee "a substantial surplus" applicable to the payment of the other debts of the assignor. But that surplus could not have been reached by a fi. fa., but only by proceedings in equity by the creditors. It was for this reason that Chief Justice Jervis held that the assignment tended to delay creditors, and was therefore void; but the case was not decided on the ground that the assignor had put it out of his power to carry on business, because, in fact, he was a farmer, and only became liable to the bankrupt law as the holder of two shares in a joint-stock bank. This case of Smith v. Cannan certainly went very far as to the meaning of the term "delay creditors" in the Bankrupt Act; and if it was not for the later case of Hale v. Alnutt, it might be easy to understand how any assignment of property by an insolvent trader could be supported in the face of that decision.

COMMON LAW.

BILLS OF SALE, WHEN THEY REQUIRE REGISTRATION—
17 & 18 VICT. c. 34, s. 1.

Murphy v. Hartley, Q. B., 7 W. R. 384.

An important though simple question was settled in this case. The Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), in effect, applied the system of "filing" or registering, which has long been required with regard to warrants of attorney and cognovits given by a trader to make them effectual as against the assignees in bankruptcy of such trader, to bills of sale. Indeed, with reference to these last instruments, the law under that Act is still more stringent; for it provides that unless filed within twenty-one days after execution (as "warrants of attorneys" given by traders are required to be by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 136), such instruments shall be void not only against the giver's assignees in bankruptcy or insolvency, but also against execution creditors. But the object of registering these instruments was only, as appears from the preamble of the Act, to prevent persons, by giving secret bills of sale to their creditors of their personal property, to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and therefore the provision (as, indeed, also appears from the concluding words of the first section) does not extend to the case of a transaction in which the creditor takes possession of the goods assigned to him by the bill of sale. And it follows, as a necessary consequence, that he has the whole of the period of twenty-one days from its execution, to choose whether he shall take possession or register. It is only when he does neither that the requirements of the Act come into operation.

LAW OF ASSURANCE—MEANING OF THE TERM "ACCIDENT" IN A POLICY.

Sinclair v. Maritime Passengers' Assurance Company,
Q. B. 9 W. R. 342.

A somewhat curious point in the law of assurance has been here determined. In a certain policy, the risk insured against was "any personal injury sustained by the assured from or by reason or in consequence of any accident to him happening upon any ocean, sea, river, or lake" within a certain period. And within such period, and while sailing on a certain river, the assured "was struck down by a sun-stroke," from the effects of which he died the same day.

The question was, whether the sun-stroke so received was "a personal injury" resulting from an "accident," within the meaning of the policy; and the Court of Queen's Bench have decided this in the negative.

There is only one reported case which appears to bear at all upon the subject—viz. Tres v. The Railway Passengers' Assurance Company (29 L. J., Exch., 218; 8 W. R. 191); and this, though relied upon to support the claim on the policy, will be found on examination to be to a certain extent an authority against it. In that case the plaintiff sued for a claim arising upon a policy which was similar to the present one, so far as the point under consideration is concerned, and it appeared that the assured had been seen to go to bathe in the sea, and was not again seen till several hours afterwards, when his dead body was washed ashore; yet it was held that there was no evidence of a personal injury caused by "accident," for that it might have been caused by paralysis or other natural causes. This case, indeed, turned directly upon the proof of the accident required in the policy to be furnished to the directors; but some of the expressions of the Barons in delivering their judgments throw light upon the meaning of the term "accident" as used in these policies—themselves, it is to be remembered, of very recent establishment—and, probably, influenced the Court of Queen's Bench in their decision as to the present case. Thus, Mr. Baron Martin incidentally observed that if a person were drowned from the upsetting of his boat or by striking his head against a rock in bathing, such death would be caused by accident, but that it would be otherwise if, being in the water, he was suddenly seized with apoplexy, or even with cramp, by means of which he became disabled and was drowned. Another of the judges suggested—but did not give his opinion as to—the instance of a man suffocated by sleeping in a room with a charcoal fire without sufficient vent.

In the present case it was admitted by the Lord Chief Justice in his judgment that it was difficult to define the term "accident" as used in policies of this nature, so as to arrive with perfect accuracy at the boundary line between death from accident and death from natural causes; but he was of opinion that in all cases of "accident" there must have been of necessity some violence or casualty, and that "sun-stroke" (notwithstanding what is implied by the word itself) is, in reality, nothing more than an inflammatory disease of the brain brought on by over exposure to the heat of the sun; and, consequently, that a death or injury occasioned thereby must be considered as resulting from a natural cause and not from an accident.

EXAMINATION OF ARTICLED CLERKS.

I have watched with considerable anxiety, being greatly interested therein, the controversy now pending on this question. It may appear rather singular, but my articles were signed the very day before the publication of the number of your Journal which entered upon a course of articles especially addressed to articled clerks. I have, therefore, to request that you will give insertion to the few remarks I am about to make, premising that they are necessarily informal. I have now been a clerk for a period of eighteen years, the last nine of which I have been a managing clerk, and that not in name only. I have been for the last six years engaged in a business of great magnitude, a portion of it comprising applications to Parliament for private Bills, for powers to construct railways and other works, and the business necessarily arising out of the construction of these works.

During this period I have also been left (by reason of the absence of the principal through sickness) for six months at a time to the unassisted management of several very heavy and important matters of business, in which I have frequently had to advise upon questions involving the most serious consequences, and that sometimes at a moment's notice; in addition to which, I have had the entire experience of all the other general business of the office,—I have had, over and over again, unassisted and alone, to attend and advise board meetings of directors and committees; to correspond with members of Parliament and public bodies, and officials; and to seek and obtain interviews with members of the Government upon special questions affecting local interests, with a multiplicity of et cetera very unnecessary to particularise; in none of which several weighty matters have I ever had the misfortune to lose the confidence of client or employer, but, on the contrary, am proud to say have made friends of both.

I happened to be born and brought up in a remote inland county, where twenty years ago parents thought very little (if indeed they thought at all, which I very much question) of a classical education; and consequently when I went first to the office, I was acquainted with nothing more than the rudiments of a very limited English education; and since that time, especially of late years, I have had enough to do, without attending to the education of myself, except in subjects absolutely necessary in conducting the business. I am not acquainted with what I believe from report to be the beautiful works of Homer, Cicero, or Virgil; I cannot understand the French, German, or other foreign language; and I am not much ashamed to confess this, seeing that not a person in the Home Office at the present moment, including Sir G. C. Lewis himself, understands the Hungarian language. I know nothing of mathematics (proper) or physics, and for the matter of that, of metaphysics either, and I could go on ad nauseam of what I do not know; and yet I shall consider it a very great hardship if any preliminary or other examination should be required (as a sine qua non to admission) to be passed by me which included the subjects (some of them at least) recommended by the Committee of the Incorporated Law Society; neither do I believe I should forfeit the confidence and esteem (which I so highly prize) of clients public, or private, or employer, by being unable to pass it; neither would they for that reason believe that I am any the less competent to act as an attorney or solicitor. It appears to me, sir, that the tide has turned, and that the present generation of articled clerks are suffering grievously from the fact that the old system was too lax, and thereby admitted a few black sheep, and seeing that the system is now likely to be changed for one going to the extreme in the other direction. By all means let us keep the profession respectable; let them be gentlemen, (and that as a general rule they must be) but this desideratum, I submit, need not be secured in any way that shall inflict unmerited and unnecessary hardship, and life-long suffering upon even one single individual. "Be just and lean to mercy," it is an old axiom, and one I believe not abused in the long run.

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

THE BANKRUPTCY BILL.

I see the official assignees in London received in 1860 not less than £22,563 for fees, giving them on an average about £2000 to pay their office expenses. If such highly paid officials are still to exist, I hope they will do their work themselves. How much of their proper work has been delegated to clerks? I submit that certainly as to some of them the clerks do so much of the work their masters should resign in their favour.

LEGAL EDUCATION.

The report of the committee of the Law Institution is very confusing. Can any of your readers explain it? It seems to me that a great many persons duly qualified will be deterred from offering themselves. £130 a year was paid at school for me, but I did not learn German, as it was not taught in the school; therefore, as I understand the report, Schiller would be my bar to admission. Many parents do not allow their sons to learn Greek; but Xenophon seems essential.

The Law of Merger as it affects Estates in Land and also Charges upon Land. By CHARLES J. MAYHEW, of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons. 1861.

We believe that every one of our readers will endorse the assertion which forms the opening sentence of the preface to this book—viz. "that the legal doctrine of merger is one of the most curious and subtle in our system of jurisprudence." And after reading Mr. Mayhew's work and perceiving, as we have done, and as every one else will do, what a vast number of cases and questions have arisen during the last few years it is probable that the profusion will not, as modestly apprehended by the author, incline to the feeling of surprise that after Mr. Preston's able treatise the writer should attempt to "touch the subject." Our readers will remember that the able treatise to which Mr. Mayhew refers is not a separate work of Mr. Preston's, having reference solely and exclusively to the law of merger, but that it consists of the 3rd vol. of that gentleman's work on the more comprehensive subject of conveyancing; it will further be remembered that Mr. Preston has hardly mentioned the law of merger as it affects charges upon land, and we conceive that a practical and comprehensive epitome of the cases and doctrines which have been elucidated in the jurisprudence of the Court of Chancery upon that division of the law in question will be useful, because, for the first time, it enables practising lawyers to ascertain the present condition of rules of doctrine which very probably have been modified by recent decisions never hitherto collected. We have read Mr. Mayhew's book with as much care as our leisure has permitted, and we can assure the profession that the author has throughout adopted a most clear and satisfactory method of marshalling the heads of his subject. The work, as indicated by the title, is divided most properly into two parts. The law of merger as it affects estates in land may be said to be matter of conveyancing science and is based upon feudal maxims, the intention of the persons concerned not being, generally speaking, a criterion which the courts consider in decision. The law of merger, as it affects charges upon land, which forms the subject matter of the second part of the work under review, is, on the other hand, matter purely of equitable doctrine. Motive and intention are the prominent considerations in question, which arise in the application of this law, and the settlement of those questions is, therefore, within the field of the jurisprudence of the Court of Chancery. Mr. Mayhew has, in dealing with both branches of his subject, evinced considerable and careful industry in collating the dicta and cases which have reference to the matter or view for the time being under consideration. He has not fallen into the error in any instance of introducing merely speculative and personal disquisitions as to the reasonableness of settled doctrines, nor, as has happened in the cases of one or two recent works of young text-writers, as to the wisdom of the Judges who may, in the author's opinion, have judged illogically or unwisely; and we can recommend his work to the consideration of those who may have need of a resumé of all the cases and doctrines to be found in the books upon either branch of the law of merger, from the earliest period down to the present time.

Mr. Preston's matter upon the subject is to some extent dateless. It is, moreover, discursive and not easily to be ascertained for want of a proper index. The reader of his work has to go fortified with previous learning on the principles of the law, and to the student or young lawyer it is not satisfactory. Mr. Mayhew's treatise contains everything which any reader can need or expect; it treats both branches of the law in an easy and intelligible method by considering "estates" in regular gradation of succession—fee-tail, life, and years, and the index to the work is complete and particular.

OBSERVATIONS BY THE MANAGING COMMITTEE OF THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION, ON THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY ON EXAMINATIONS IN GENERAL KNOWLEDGE, AND ON INTERMEDIATE EXAMINATIONS IN LEGAL KNOWLEDGE, TO BE INSTITUTED UNDER THE ATTORNEYS ACT 1860.

The committee have appended a copy of the report,* in which they have incorporated the alterations which they desire to recommend to the council.

If the council should feel any difficulty in adopting any of these suggestions, the committee, feeling that they represent a large number of professional men who take a deep interest in this subject, would be glad to be allowed the opportunity of verbally explaining their views to the council.

In the meantime they submit the following few observations which, for convenience sake, they have numbered in accordance with the order of their suggestions upon the accompanying report.

1. It would have been better if the 5th section of the Act had referred to examinations then or thereafter to be established by any of the universities instead of in any of the universities; so as to avoid any question whether the middle class examinations are included in the provisions of the Act—the committee submit, however, that the wording of the rule ought to follow the wording of the Act.

2. The judges have not any power to make a rule to permit persons to be articulated for any specified term. The object of the Act is to regulate the conditions under which persons having been articulated may be admitted, and the rule should be worded in accordance with this object.

5. The committee submit that the elementary amount of mathematics under the 5th head of the second part of the examination ought to be required from all persons seeking to enter the profession.

It is not an unimportant consideration that a similar amount is now required from all persons seeking to obtain from the Royal College of Physicians a license to practise; that learned body having recently established a preliminary examination, in all respects analogous to that proposed for our profession.

6. The scheme of this second part of the examination, as drawn, does not appear to the committee to recognize sufficiently the important distinction between the general rules which are to be made by the judges, and the temporary regulations which are to be made, and from time to time varied, by the examiners.

The alterations suggested will if adopted bring the scheme more into harmony with the regulations contained in the calendars of our universities, which have also served as a model for the regulations above referred to, recently issued by the Royal College of Physicians.

7. The committee consider this suggestion to be important. Questions arising from the subjects of the passages selected for translation afford to examiners an invaluable means of testing whether the candidate has prepared for his examination by intelligent study, or by mere cram.

In this respect also the committee propose only to follow the well considered practice of other examining bodies.

8. The study of moral and mental science is so important and so well calculated to exert a beneficial influence upon members of our profession, that the committee would regret to see the scheme prepared by the council omit distinctly to recognize it; while, on the other hand, considering the average age at which the examination will have to be passed, the committee feel that it would be impossible to do more than insert it as an optional alternative.

9. As all persons who have been articulated since the passing of the late Act have had full notice that a preliminary examination was contemplated, the committee do not think that any reasonable complaint can be made if all are subjected to the first part of the examination. Indeed, it is obvious that no person is fit to enter the ranks of the profession who is unable to pass an elementary examination in these subjects; while on the other hand the committee entirely concur with the council in thinking that it would not be expedient to subject such persons to the proposed second part of the preliminary examination.

10. The committee regret to see that it is proposed that all the examinations should take place in the hall of the Incorporated Society; and they greatly fear that this resolution if adhered to will cause much dissatisfaction in the country, and will tend to prevent that cordial co-operation in adopting the beneficial provisions of the Act which is obviously so much to be desired.

The wording of the 9th section of the Act is as wide as possible, and contemplates the establishment of more than one intermediate examination; and the committee trust that the council will ask the judges by the new rules to leave them at liberty, should their first experience lead them to desire to do so, to establish additional examinations, and to hold such examinations in as close a proximity as possible to the offices in which the articulated clerks are serving their time.

In order to render a period of clerkship one of real and systematic study, the committee would be glad hereafter to see a scheme devised under which every articulated clerk in the Kingdom should be examined at the end of every year, at some place within easy reach of his own home.

The committee feel that it would be very injudicious to attempt to establish any such system at the present time; but they are on the other hand equally convinced of the expediency of so wording the rules as to enable the council from time to time to modify the detail of these arrangements in accordance with the results of their growing experience, and they would especially regret to see any rule so worded as to render local examinations impossible.

The University of London have recently adopted a plan by which with great facility the examiners, though themselves remaining in London, conduct matriculation examinations at the various affiliated provincial colleges. A slight modification of this plan, which if the council are not already acquainted with it, we should be glad to have the opportunity of explaining—would enable examinations to be held in every town where there is a Provincial Law Society, and, indeed, in every town where there is a solicitor of established reputation.

The committee are not desirous to urge the council to adopt it even partially in the first instance; but they are very anxious that the council should secure the liberty to adopt it hereafter if they should see fit; and they feel sure that as the rule in its present proposed shape would be viewed in many places with considerable jealousy, so the mere liberty to hold local examinations would tend to excite throughout the country the sympathy and co-operation of our provincial brethren.

REGULATIONS ALTERED AS SUGGESTED BY THE COMMITTEE OF THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

That from and after the 1st day of Term 186 , every person who before entering into articles of clerkship shall produce to the registrar of attorneys a certificate that he has successfully passed the senior middle-class examination established in (1) the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, or the Moderation examination at Oxford, or the Previous examination at Cambridge, or the Matriculation examination at the universities of Dublin, Durham, or London, may be admitted and enrolled as an attorney or solicitor after having been subsequently bound by and having duly served under articles of clerkship to a practising attorney or solicitor for the term of 4 years (2).

In order to carry into effect the enactment in the 8th section, the committee recommend

That from and after the 1st day of Term 186 , every person proposing to enter into articles of clerkship for five years, shall produce to the registrar a certificate either that he has successfully passed the junior middle-class examination established in (1) the universities of Oxford or Cambridge, or taken a first-class in the examinations of the College of Preceptors, or has successfully passed an examination by special examiners, whom the committee further recommend that the Lords Chief Justices and Chief Baron, jointly with the Master of the Rolls, be requested to appoint, and that such last-mentioned examination take place half-yearly, and consist of two parts.

ALTERED PROGRAMME OF EXAMINATION AS PROPOSED BY THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

N.B. No alteration is suggested in Part I.

PART II.

Papers also to be set in the following six subjects, and each candidate to be required to offer himself for examination in three subjects at least, of which Latin and Mathematics must be two (5), but no candidate to be examined in more than four.

1. Latin.—Translation of passages to be selected, two years previously by the examiners, from two of the classical authors ordinarily read in schools (6). Candidates to have liberty of choice between the two works.

2. Greek.—Translation of passages selected from two of the classical authors ordinarily read in schools. Candidates to have liberty of choice between the two authors.

(The classical subjects are until Term 186 , Latin.—"Caesar's Commentaries," "De Bello Gallico" (books I. & II.), and "Virgil's Æneid" (books I. & II.).—(Greek: St. John's Gospel; Xenophon's "Anabasis" (book I.).

3. French.—Translation of passages selected from a French author of established reputation, ordinarily read in schools; easy English sentences to be translated into French.

The French subject is until Term, 186 , Fenelon's "Télémaque."

4. German.—Translation of passages selected from a German author of established reputation, ordinarily read in schools; easy English sentences to be translated into German.

The German subject is until Term, 186 , Schiller's "Revolt of the Netherlands."

Besides these translations in the several languages, the candidate to answer, if required, questions on grammar, history, and geography, arising from the selected passages (7).

5. Mathematics.—"Euclid" (books I. & II.). Algebra, to simple equations, inclusive.

6. Physics.—"The Elements of Natural Philosophy."

7. Ethics.—"The Elements of Moral Philosophy" (8)

If the examiners conducting such examinations be satisfied with the answers given to the questions, they will sign a certificate to the following effect.

"We certify that A. B. has been examined by us in general knowledge, as required by the rules and regulations of Term, 186 , of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, and we testify that he has passed a satisfactory examination."

Each person on receiving his certificate to pay the fee of

The committee do not think it expedient to commend that persons who have been articleed after the passing of the Act on the 28th August, 1860, but before the rules come into operation, should be examined in Part II. of the above examination, but they recommend that an examination in Part I. should in those cases be added to the intermediate examination in legal knowledge (9).

In reference to this examination the committee recommend that the 2nd rule suggested by the council should be worded as follows:—

2. That such intermediate examination shall be conducted in each term by the examiners appointed under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, the orders of the Master of the Rolls of 13th January, 1844, and the rules of the common law courts of Hilary Term, 1853, at such times and places as the examiners shall from time to time appoint (10).

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—REMUNERATION TO WITNESSES.

We have received the following communication from a gentleman who is very conversant with the administration of the criminal law, and can speak with some authority on the question now exciting so much attention—the insufficient remuneration of witnesses under the present Treasury scale:—

In the port of Liverpool there are frequent robberies of goods and merchandize from ships, dock-quays, warehouses and other places where the same are deposited; and on a report of such robberies being made known to the police, it is the particular duty of the constables forming the detective department to endeavour to discover the thief and property. In the performance of this duty they experience great difficulties in eliciting information from the labouring classes in consequence of the inadequate remuneration they receive if compelled to attend the police court and sessions or assizes. This unwillingness is more particularly amongst carters and porters, who refuse to give any information, not from dishonest motives, but simply from the insufficient pay awarded to witnesses in all stages of a criminal prosecution. If some of these difficulties should be overcome, and the officer investigating the case had apprehended parties suspected and got the case sufficiently ripe for an enquiry before a justice, he has much trouble in getting the witnesses to the police court and still more in detaining them until the case is called on. To do this he has often to pay such witnesses out of his own pocket in the form of refreshments and sometimes in money to keep them together, as well at the police court as at the trial. Carters only receive 1s. 6d. per day for attending the police court, and at the same time have to pay a man 4s. per day for driving the cart during their absence; porters receive also 1s. 6d. per day for attending the police court, and as porters they receive 3s. 6d. per day. Town witnesses, of whatever class in society, receive no more than 2s. 6d. per day attending at the sessions, and 3s. 6d. per day attending at the assizes. Witnesses from a distance receive for attending the police court 2s. 6d. per day, and 2s. 6d. per night; when attending sessions 3s. 6d. per day and 2s. per night, and when attending the assizes, the same daily allowance with 6d. extra for bed. For travelling, in no case is more than second-class railway fare allowed. In consequence of this parsimony on the part of Government, the detective constables say they have failed to obtain sufficient evidence in many cases of felony, particularly of the class before mentioned, from the porters who, they were morally certain, from information before received, had assisted in the loading of the stolen goods, refusing to know anything, and the same as regards the carters who had carted the goods away. They have wasted days making inquiries amongst carters and porters without any good resulting therefrom, and this they attribute entirely to the small sum allowed to witnesses in criminal prosecutions. Those who have once been witnesses tell others what they have received, and thus it becomes generally known. Witnesses brought from a distance to Liverpool in every case are money out of pocket. This falls particularly heavy on poor persons without means to bear the burden, and to enable them to return home the police authorities have to make up the deficiency. In some cases, parties required as witnesses before a police magistrate will not say anything or leave their homes until the police authorities have guaranteed first-class railway fares and a reasonable sum per day during their absence from home; and the detective constables say, "We find this reluctance to afford information to prevail in all grades of society, and we know of our own knowledge that many a thief escapes detection, and, if apprehended, conviction, from the causes before mentioned. Many will put up with the loss and let the thief go rather than have the trouble of attending the police court for two or three days and then the sessions or assizes for the same period, losing their time and money."

As regards the remuneration to police officers, when they have to attend trials at a distance, the pay allowed them is 1s. 6d. per day and 2s. per night. It would be an insult to common sense to suppose this sum sufficient to support them. They say "many of us have attended in London and other towns and received the above reward for our labours, together with third-class railway fare. In each case we have been money out of pocket more or less, according to the length of time we were away." Prior to the issuing of Sir George Grey's rules and regulations as to the scales of payment to witnesses in criminal cases, the detective constables say they experienced no such reluctance to give information on the part of prosecutors and witnesses as now exists.

There is another great grievance to complain of. Witnesses in criminal cases, as a rule, are poor people who have to rely on their daily labour for their support. They know the trifling sum per day that will be allowed them for attending the court before trial, and are perfectly indifferent in attending the court at the time they are warned to be there, and they make their appearance at different hours during the morning, sometimes keeping the grand jury waiting and sometimes the Court, thereby causing unpleasant remarks to be made by the judge towards the prosecuting attorney and the police officers on the case, but which it is impossible to avoid unless an officer is set to watch over each witness during the night and bring him to the court in the morning at the proper time. As it is, much anxiety and trouble are caused, and frequently messengers in cabs have to be sent after the absent witnesses, thereby incurring expenses which are not allowed by the taxing-officer of the court. It may be said the witnesses are bound over and may be called on their recognisances and have the same forfeited. What do they care? They have no goods worth distraining upon or money to pay, and it would be absurd to take their bodies.

UNCERTIFICATED ATTORNEYS.

At the Bristol County Court (before Sir J. Eardley Wilmott, Bart.), on the 26th instant, Mr. Miller, solicitor, asked his Honour, before the public business of the court was commenced, to allow him to make an application with reference to a matter which was not only of importance to the profession to which he belonged, but also to the Court itself. His Honour was aware that attorneys and solicitors were obliged by Act of Parliament to take out annually a certificate to practise, the proper time being between the 15th of November and the 15th of December in every year. The penalty for not taking out such certificate under the Attorney's Act, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, sec. 26, was as follows:—"And be it enacted that no person, who, as an attorney or solicitor, shall sue, prosecute, defend, or carry on any action, or suit, or any proceedings in any of the courts aforesaid, without having previously obtained a stamped certificate, which shall be then in force, shall be capable of maintaining any action or suit at law or in equity for the recovery of any fee, reward, or disbursement for, or in respect of, any business, matter, or thing done by him as an attorney or solicitor as aforesaid whilst he shall have been without such certificate as last aforesaid." It was not without some pain and regret on the part of some members of the profession, himself included, that they found by the Law List, of 1860 (a book published by the authority of the registrar of certificates, which though not actually an official document, or evidence in a court of law, was considered by the profession as tantamount to evidence), the absence of six attorneys' names, of this city, from that book, which, in fact, was evidence that they were practising without a certificate—that no less than six names of attorneys, who daily, or weekly, or periodically practised before his Honour in that court, did not appear in that book. Of course, he did not mention names in the matter—he should not choose to do so—still there was the fact patent to any person who liked to look into the book for 1860, that the names of six attorneys, practising in the city then, did not appear in it. His Honour was aware that towards the close of last year another Act of Parliament affecting attorneys was passed, having for its object in some degree to raise the status of the profession by providing for the examination of articled clerks during their articles to test their proficiency and acquirements. That Act was 23 & 24 Vic., c. 127, and was passed on the 27th of August last. He referred to the 27th section, which was as follows:—"Every certificate issued by the registrar between the 15th day of November and the 16th day of December, in any year, shall bear date the 16th day of November, and shall take effect on that day for all purposes, provided it be stamped before the 16th day of December, and in every such case the 16th day of November shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to be the date of the payment of the duty; but if such certificate be not so stamped, it shall take effect, as regards the qualification to practise, on the day on which it is stamped; and every certificate issued at any other time shall bear date on the day on which it is issued, and subject to the provision herein contained relating to certificates stamped after the 1st day of January in any year, and not produced within a month to be entered by the Registrar, shall take effect, as regards such qualification, on the day on which it is stamped; and every certificate shall be and continue in force from the day on which it shall take effect, as aforesaid, until the 15th day of November next following inclusive, and no longer; and any list of attorneys, solicitors, and conveyancers purporting to be published by the authority of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and to contain the names of attorneys, solicitors, and conveyancers who have obtained stamped certificates for the current year on or before the 1st day of January in the same year, shall, until the contrary be made to appear, be evidence in all courts, before all justices of the peace, and others, that the persons named therein as attorneys, solicitors, or conveyancers holding such certificates, as aforesaid, of the current year, are attorneys, solicitors, or conveyancers holding such certificates, and the absence of the name of any person from such list, shall, until the contrary be made to appear, be evidence, as aforesaid, that such person is not qualified to practise as an attorney, or solicitor, or conveyancer, under a certificate for the current year; but in the case of any person being an attorney or solicitor, whose name does not appear in such list, an extract from the roll of attorneys and solicitors kept by the registrar, certified under the hand of the secretary of the Incorporated Law Society (while such society performs the duties of registrar), or of the registrar for the time being, shall be evidence, as aforesaid, of the facts appearing in such extract; and in the case of any person being a conveyancer, whose name does not appear on such list, the fact of his being so shall be proved in the way in which it is now by law required to be proved." Such was the present state of the law on the subject. The Law List was in future to be the absolute authority in all courts, whether an attorney had or had not taken out a certificate at the proper time. From the new Law List first published under that Act, by the authority of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, were absent the names of parties who were in the habit of appearing before the court, and not having taken out certificates. There were not so many names omitted from the Law List this year as there were last year; still certain parties' names did not appear in it. He referred to what they, unfortunately, all knew, that a certain gentleman, no longer among them, his Honour was obliged to summarily expel from the court last year, and that last week they saw by the public prints that his Honour felt himself called upon to tell a solicitor that his conduct was not such as became a gentleman, and (continued Mr. Miller) such circumstances, however remotely they might affect the attorneys, were felt by the profession at large to, in some degree, cast a stigma on the profession, which was not desirable if it could be avoided. His application was founded on the 86th rule of the county court, which was this:—"86. No attorney shall be allowed to appear for any person in a county court until he has signed a roll or book to be kept by the registrar for that purpose, but no fee shall be payable for that purpose, and he shall once in every year, if required by the registrar, produce his certificate for the year to the registrar, who shall note the fact on the roll." His application was that the registrar might be called on to refer to the Law List, and where he saw an attorney's name omitted to put in force the 86th rule, by calling on such attorney to produce his certificate before he appeared in a cause before his Honour. It perhaps would be hard to enforce the rule without notice, and if it met his Honour's approbation, he would suggest that until that day month should be given to enable attorneys to obtain certificates before the registrar be called on to enforce the rule. He made that application with the cognisance and approbation of many of the members of the profession, who were, however, absent—as that was somewhat out of the usual course of county court days—in attendance at the neighbouring assize, and that perhaps would account in some degree for his not being supported by some other members of the profession on that occasion.

His Honour said he was obliged to Mr. Miller for bringing the matter before the Court, for it was important that gentlemen practising there should come properly authorised by the possession of a certificate and every requisite. In almost every case, he had reason to thank the attorneys for the ability with which they conducted the cases in court; but if anything in any quarter required amendment, he would order the enforcement of the rule, which had not been strictly done hitherto. Every gentleman in the profession would be glad to have that rule enforced, and once a-year the attorneys should be called on to show their certificate to the registrar. No one would feel aggrieved at that.

Ultimately his Honour ordered that after the expiration of one month from that time the registrar do ask for the production of the certificates for the current year of solicitors practising in that court.

UNCONDITIONAL ASSURANCE ON LIFE.

Under the New Scheme (Class B) of the LIFE ASSOCIATION OF SCOTLAND there is no liability to Forfeiture or to extra Charges, or to any Restrictions as to Residence or Occupation. Further, the Policy-holder is not left in uncertainty as to the sum he will receive back, if he should give up his Policy; but this is fixed at first, being an unusually large proportion of his payments. There are, also, other concessions to the Policy-holder. The policies are, therefore, peculiarly valuable for almost every purpose. Persons proceeding to unhealthy climates, are, however, not eligible for admission to the Scheme. Prospectuses, containing full explanations, will be forwarded to any part of the country.

A medical officer in attendance daily, at half-past 12 o'clock.

THOS. FRASER, Res. Secy.

London, 20, King William-street, E.C.

ON 5TH APRIL NEXT, the Original Scheme (Class A.) of the Life Association of Scotland will be Closed for the 22nd Annual Balance; and Entrants will secure Special Advantages.

Those who desire to avail themselves of Life Assurance at the smallest outlay consistent with due security, are invited to examine into this Scheme, and its results to the Policy-holders. Prospectuses will be furnished on application. Assurances can be effected in any part of the kingdom.

A medical officer in attendance daily, at half-past 12 o'clock.

Applications should be lodged on or before 5th April.

THOS. FRASER, Res. Secy.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.—Under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, this Company now offers to new Insurers EIGHTY PER CENT of the PROFITS, AT QUINQUENNIAL DIVISIONS, OR A LOW RATE OF PREMIUM, without participation of Profits.

Since the establishment of the Company in 1821, the Amount of Profits allotted to the Assured has exceeded in Cash value £660,000, which represents equivalent Reversionary Bonuses of £1,058,000.

After the Division of Profits at Christmas 1859, the Life Assurances in force, with existing Bonuses thereon, amounted to upwards of £4,730,000, the Income from the Life Branch £207,000 per annum, and the Life Assurance Fund exceeded £1,618,000.

LOCAL MILITIA AND VOLUNTEER CORPS.—No extra Premium is required for service therein.

INVALID LIVES assured at corresponding Extra Premiums.

LOANS granted on Life Policies to the extent of their values, if such value be not less than £50.

ASSIGNMENTS OF POLICIES.—Written notices of, received and registered.

MEDICAL FEES paid by the Company, and no charge for Policy Stamps.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, that Fire Policies which expire at Lady-day must be renewed within fifteen days at this Office; or with Mr. Sama, No. 1, St. James's-street, corner of Pall-mall; or with the Company's agents throughout the Kingdom, otherwise they become void.

Losses caused by Explosion of Gas are admitted by this Company.

UNITED KINGDOM LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY,

No. 8, WATERLOO PLACE, PALL MALL, LONDON, S.W.

The Hon. FRANCIS SCOTT, CHAIRMAN.

Fourth Division of Profits.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Parties desirous of participating in the fourth division of profits to be declared on policies effected prior to the 31st of December, 1861, should make immediate application. There have already been three divisions of profits, and the bonuses divided have averaged nearly 3 per cent. per annum on the sums assured, or from 30 to 100 per cent. on the premiums paid, without the risk of co-partnership.

To show more clearly what these bonuses amount to, the three following cases are given as examples:

Sum Insured.	Bonuses added.	Amount payable up to Dec., 1854.
£5,000	£1,987 10	£6,987 10
1,000	379 10	1,379 10
100	39 15	139 15

Notwithstanding these large additions, the premiums are on the lowest scale compatible with security; in addition to which advantages, one-half of the premiums may, if desired, for the term of five years, remain unpaid at 5 per cent. interest, without security or deposit of the policy.

The assets of the Company at the 31st December, 1859, amounted to £690,140 19s., all of which had been invested in Government and other approved securities.

No charge for Volunteer Military Corps while serving in the United Kingdom.

Policy stamps paid by the office.

For prospectuses, &c., apply to the Resident Director, No. 8, Waterloo-place, Pall-mall.

By order, E. L. BOYD, Resident Director.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The proceedings on the Home Circuit during the last week present the singular feature of an action brought by a gentleman against a lady ostensibly to recover damages for the breach of an engagement to marry him, but really to vindicate his character against the imputation of immorality by which the lady justified her change of mind. Lord Chief Justice Erle made many strenuous efforts to escape the unpleasant duty of having to try this case. He seemed most entirely to agree with Mr. Serjt. Ballantine that "it was always a very painful matter when a gentleman brought an action of this description against a lady." As the plaintiff's counsel stated that his object was not damages, it really seemed rather hard that the judge and jury should be forced to try the case. If the defendant had rejected the plaintiff without assigning any reason, except that she was tired of him, he would not have complained—at least not before a court of justice; but character is dear to those who do not value money. It seems that the young lady's father was labouring under a sense of his obligation to bring before the Court what he knew of the plaintiff's life and conduct, and so he persisted in refusing to withdraw the obnoxious plea. The plaintiff's counsel had got into the correspondence, when an energetic representation by the judge of the mischief to the defendant of her friends' obstinacy at last inclined them to a compromise, and the further progress of the case was stayed.

From the Bristol Assizes is reported the trial of an action brought against "The Bristol Bread and Flour Company, Limited," by their late secretary, for ten months' salary. It appeared that he had served them zealously during that time. "He was engaged from after breakfast till 1 or 2 o'clock next morning," in the advancement of the interests of a company which nevertheless appears to be verging on winding-up. The only trace of business done by it is the allowance of bread and flour for his family to the company's own manager. The people of Bristol seem to have been wanting in enthusiasm for the cause in which this energetic secretary went through such a long day's work. If, indeed, self-devotion could have established the "Bread and Flour Company, Limited," this secretary and the directors under whom he acted would have accomplished what they undertook. We read that there were seven directors who were entitled to divide among them the sum of thirty shillings by way of remuneration for attendance at each weekly board-meeting. Surely the duty of director of a public company was never before undertaken at the rate of less than five shillings a week! At a meeting of shareholders it was resolved to offer to the plaintiff the rather unsubstantial remuneration of one hundred paid-up shares. The jury gave him £200 in addition to £50 received on account.

The West India Incumbered Estates Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 117), which was framed on the model of the Irish Act previously passed for the same purpose, has hitherto, except as regards two or three of the smaller islands, remained a dead letter. The cause of this is easily explained. Unlike the Irish Act the West India Act was not compulsory, but permissive in its character. It was left entirely to the discretion of the different colonies to adopt it or not, as their own Legislatures might determine. We can easily perceive, therefore, that such a measure would be regarded with no friendly eyes by that class in the colonies, and we fear it is a numerous and influential one, who are interested in maintaining the existing state of things. If all the heavily incumbered estates in the West Indies were brought to the hammer, as they ought to be, the profits of their managers would be most materially curtailed. It is this powerful interest which has hitherto rendered the West India Act all but inoperative. But we are glad to learn that it will remain so no longer. By the last mail from Jamaica, we hear that the Legislature of that important island has adopted the Act. It reflects great credit on that body to have done so, as in Jamaica, more, perhaps, than in any other colony, the interests opposed to the measure in question must have been numerous and strong. That fine island, from causes to which we need not now refer, has suffered more than any other from the effects of negro emancipation. It has more heavily incumbered estates than any other West India colony, and the transfer of a number of these to fresh owners will infuse both energy and capital into the island. This transfer will be effected expeditiously and cheaply by means of the court established in England for the purpose, the business of which may be now expected steadily to increase. As our principal West India colony has of her own accord adopted the Incumbered Estates Act, it is probable that most, if not all, the others will, sooner or later, follow her example.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNEY'S AFFIRMATION BILL.

The Affirmation Bill of the member for Tavistock, the second reading of which was moved in the House of Commons on the 14th instant, proposes to remedy a striking imperfection in our judicial machinery. In the spirit of recent legislation on the subject of judicial evidence, it removes one more obstacle to the elucidation of truth. It facilitates considerably the access to justice by making one more breach in the barriers which have so long blocked up its avenues, and on which lawyers have inscribed the title of Competency of Witnesses. This end it attains by very simple means. It admits the evidence of a class of persons, not very numerous it is true, but who, as the law at present stands, however unimpeachable their moral conduct, however honourable their social position, however spotless their commercial integrity, because they refuse to bow to a religious sanction, are placed below the level of the convicted felon. Finally, it abolishes an anomalous distinction between the admissibility of written depositions and of vivâ voce testimony, occasioned by the fact that in the latter case only is an objection ever taken to a witness on the ground of his religious belief.

The progress of ideas in this country on the subject of oaths may be very briefly indicated. Two hundred and fifty years ago, the narrow-minded bigotry of the age led Lord Coke to decide that no evidence was admissible in a court of justice which was not fortified by oath and accompanied with a profession of Christian faith. A century later, in the Chancellorship of Lord Hardwicke, the sworn evidence of an unconverted Gentoo was admitted in a court of equity, after solemn argument before all the judges. More recently, judicial opinions have been expressed, to the effect that it is sufficient that the witness should avow his belief in an Avenger of falsehood. But the evidence of persons who, while declaring themselves to be Christians, refused on conscientious grounds to be sworn, was excluded for a much longer period. It was not till 1834 that any concession in this respect was made to the sects. In that year, Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists were permitted to make an affirmation in lieu of an oath. In 1854, the like privilege was extended to all who alleged themselves to be actuated by conscientious motives, provided the Court was satisfied of the sincerity of the objection. No further relaxation has been introduced in favour of persons in this country who do not entertain the required religious convictions, except by the statute of the second year of the present reign, which is, in fact, only confirmatory of the previous dicta of Lord Hardwicke, and allows the administration of an oath "with such ceremonies as the witness may declare binding in cases where an oath may be lawfully administered." The evidence of those who do not acknowledge a superintending Providence is not rendered admissible by this statute, for no oath can be administered to him who refuses to acknowledge a religious sanction. It is the case of these persons, or rather of those who suffer by the present exclusion of their testimony, that Sir J. Trelawney's Bill is chiefly designed to meet, though it also seeks to carry out the suggestion of Mr. Bentham, and in effect to abolish judicial oaths altogether. In the wisdom of this latter portion of the Bill we cannot acquiesce. The main end of an oath is to guarantee the veracity of the witness, and so long as persons are found to attach importance to the religious ceremony, so long ought that ceremony to be kept up. Wherever the religious sanction is felt to exist, there is no reason why it should not be appealed to with advantage. And the solemn adjuration of the Divine Being serves another purpose. The language of a judicial witness should be more guarded and precise than is demanded by the usage of every-day life, and the oath which reminds us of our relation to a Higher Power has a powerful effect in producing veracity. But the question, whether the testimony of a witness who refuses to recognise any religious sanction ought on that account to be peremptorily excluded is not affected by the foregoing consideration, and it is to this part of Sir J. Trelawney's Bill that we wish to direct attention.

In every judicial investigation, one of the first objects of the Court is to procure evidence—the best, if it can be had, if not, the best that can be had. But the caution which requires in all cases, as a condition of admissibility, the presence of an oath, may obviously be pressed into the service of falsehood. Witnesses have been forewarned ere now, the combined force of the moral, the legal, and the religious sanctions, notwithstanding; and where is the security that the examinations on the voir dire will elicit religious convictions which the proffered witness really entertains? If he declines to make any definite statement, the Court has neither power to compel him to avow his religious belief nor to cross-examine him respecting it. The sworn depositions of those who have come in contact with him can alone be relied on in order to discredit his testimony, and it is plain that in many cases these will not be forthcoming. Let him, however, succeed in satisfying the judge on this preliminary inquiry and he will be enabled to claim credence for his statements, which but for the presence of the oath would not have been due to them.

Let us examine, on the other hand, the probability of falsehood which attaches to a witness who, on the ground of absence of religious belief, refuses to be sworn. It will be found to be of the slenderest possible description. Could he take any course better adapted to defeat his object? He declines to give the single guarantee of good faith that is asked of him. He offers his statements for what they are worth, uninvested with the garb of solemnity. He risks all the perils of cross-examination, but withholds the assurance required by the law, that what he says may be relied on.

While the evidence of such a person is absolutely rejected, the unsworn testimony of "barbarous, and uncivilized people in our colonies, destitute of a knowledge of God, or of any religious belief," has been rendered admissible by Act of Parliament, so that the exclusion enforced by the present rule must be regarded as a penalty inflicted on certain individuals. But the weight of the penalty, unfortunately, does not fall where it ought. For who is really injured by the exclusion of the proffered evidence? The proof of the innocence of the accused is often locked up in the breast of a single witness. But the witness disbelieves in a moral Governor of the Universe. Is the prisoner at the bar to suffer for the imperfect religious convictions of the only person who can exculpate him? Are the doubts of the unbeliever to be visited on the head of the orthodox Christian? Should the atheistical opinions of the one be allowed to operate to the prejudice of the other, who is in no way responsible for them? And this in order to satisfy an arbitrary rule of evidence, "Non nisi juratis creditur!"

Or take the case of a witness for the prosecution, who is subpoenaed to prove the guilt of an accomplice. He is reluctantly forced into the witness box, but he can effectually screen his partner in crime without fear of committal for contempt. Nothing is easier; the counsel for the prisoner desires that he should be questioned as to his religious belief—the answers are unsatisfactory, the Court is bound to pronounce him incompetent, and he is ordered to stand down. He does stand down, and he goes out laughing. We could mention stronger cases where the operation of the present law has been to confer impunity on crime—cases where young children, sole witnesses of their own wrongs, have been debarred from giving evidence against unnatural fathers, because those fathers had taken care that they should be entirely destitute of any definite religious ideas. But it is sufficient to glance at these instances, which anyone may easily multiply for himself.

The truth of the matter is, that the distinction hitherto taken between the competency and the credibility of a witness breaks down as soon as you begin to investigate it. Between competency and incompetency, indeed, the difference is indisputable, but it is a difference which has absolutely no meaning except in reference to a technical rule of law. A competent witness is one whose evidence is admissible in a court of justice, an incompetent witness is one whose evidence is rejected there, by the rules of law existing at the moment when it is tendered. But a witness who in conformity with those rules is rejected as incompetent may in many cases be more worthy of credit than one whose testimony is admitted. Thus an intoxicated person is incompetent as a witness; but the spontaneous utterances of one man whose powers of invention are paralysed by alcohol might conceivably be more trustworthy than those of another whose soberness enables him to carry out designs of premeditated falsehood. So the evidence of a child of too tender an age to understand the nature of an oath might, in a particular instance, be much more safely relied on than that of an adult on whom no oath has any binding effect. It is a presumption of law that every witness believes in a God, until his disbelief is established out of his own mouth or that of others; but it is just because it is only a presumption of law that his credibility ought to derive little weight from the circumstance. In all cases, it is the credibility of the witness that has in the last resort to be inquired into; and while no form should be discarded that is likely to conduce to the elucidation of truth, none should be retained in those cases where the test it supplies is an illusory one, or where it serves to exclude evidence which may be sifted by appropriate methods, and is often of capital importance.

THE SALMON FISHERY COMMISSION.

The supply of salmon in the rivers of Great Britain has for many years past been steadily diminishing, and a royal commission was appointed last autumn to inquire into the causes, and, if possible, to devise a remedy. Their report as to the fisheries of England and Wales has recently been published, and the recommendations embodied in it are of a somewhat startling character. Their adoption would, no doubt, tend most materially to increase our native supplies of salmon. But there are difficulties in the way of a more formidable character than the commissioners appear to be aware of. We fear, indeed, that these difficulties will be found to be insurmountable.

The causes which have led to the steady diminution of our native supplies of salmon are, first, the growth of towns, and the increase of population in certain localities; and, secondly, the employment of an infinite variety of fixed engines, both in our rivers and upon our sea coasts, in the capture of this justly prized fish. It is obvious that as regards the first nothing can be done; for, as the commissioners in their report truly observe, "the interests of manufactures nationally considered must be deemed paramount to those of fisheries." But as regards the second the case is different. There is not the smallest doubt that the removal of all fixed engines employed in the capture of salmon in our rivers and upon our sea coasts would be followed by a large increase in the supply. But without a sweeping alteration in the law this cannot be done. Private property to a large amount would necessarily be destroyed by any such innovation, and Parliament would justly regard with suspicion any measure which promised such a result. But the commissioners have come to the conclusion that something of the kind must be done. The evidence they have heard from all parts of the kingdom induces them apparently to believe that some decisive steps must be taken if we would prevent the gradual diminution and the final disappearance of our home supplies of salmon. Before, however, adverting to the remedies proposed by the commissioners, let us see what statutes are now in force for the regulation of salmon fisheries in England and Wales, and whether or not these require alteration.

The Acts now in force are the 58 Geo. 3, c. 43, and the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 33. By these the magistrates of each county in quarter sessions are empowered to fix the seasons when it shall be lawful to capture salmon in their respective districts. This provision at first sight may appear a fair and prudent one, but in practice it has been found to work very badly. Our principal rivers often form the boundaries of different counties. The Severn, for example, intersects no less than four. A variety of different jurisdictions are thus created over the same river. The magistrates of each county which it touches in its course may, and often do, fix a different close time when all fishing is prohibited. It thus happens not only that different portions of the same river are subject to different rules, but where it separates two counties it may be lawful to fish upon one side while it is close time on the other. On some parts of the Severn it appears that this anomalous state of things now prevails.

The Commissioners propose that instead of leaving it to the local authorities to fix the close time in their respective counties, the Legislature should fix one uniform season for the whole kingdom. The evidence they have heard from all parts induces them to conclude that this arrangement would be a great improvement upon the present system. They recommend accordingly that the close season for salmon fishing throughout the kingdom should, except for rod fishing only, commence on the 1st of September and end on the 1st of February. They further recommend the formation of a central board similar to that which exists in Ireland, to be invested with the power of making bye-laws for the regulation of the salmon fisheries. They further recommend that under this board a local board of conservators should be appointed for each river, as is also the case in Ireland. The plan of the Commissioners, in short, is borrowed directly from that which was introduced into the sister island by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 92.

But by far the most important of the recommendations of the Commissioners, is that in which they propose that "all fixed engines on the estuaries and sea coasts" should be suppressed. "These engines," they say, "with few exceptions, are of modern invention. Stake-nets have been scarcely known in England until within the last fifty years, and bag nets are still more recent, and they are opposed to the whole aim and spirit of the fishing laws, the object of which, as has been fully shown, was to secure to the salmon a free passage to and from the sea, and to cause an equitable distribution of them throughout the rivers. These engines are baneful to the fisheries, not only on account of the number of fish which they destroy, but also because they scare and drive them away to the sea, when they come in shoals seeking the rivers, thereby exposing them to be injured or destroyed in a variety of ways."

There are several other matters of detail which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, require alteration; but the passage we have quoted contains by far the most important of their recommendations. We need hardly add, that if it can be carried into effect, it cannot fail to add largely to our home supplies of salmon. But will Parliament sanction a measure of so sweeping a character? We very much doubt it. Whatever may have been the ancient policy of the law, there is no doubt that a good title can be shown in numerous instances to these fixed engines which it is now proposed wholly to sweep away. Their owners will not hesitate to denounce as confiscation in its most arbitrary form the recommendation of the Commissioners. We confess we do not see at present how this difficulty is to be overcome.

The English Law of Domicil.

CHAP. IX.

OF TWO EQUAL DOMICILS.

Although it is generally easy to determine where a man has his domicil, so far as the possession of a house wherein he resides, is concerned, yet, as I have said in another place, it has happened more than once that an individual of wealthy means, and eccentric or wandering disposition, has possessed establishments in different countries of the globe at one and the same time. A case is barely within the limits of possibility where the circumstances are precisely similar in the case of two domicils; for as any one circumstance relating to either would be allowed to weigh either for or against it—this is not only an argument against a man having two domicils, but almost shows the impossibility of such a thing subsisting at all, independently of the view which the law might take of such a possibility. One of the most difficult cases coming under this head which has perhaps ever occurred was the case of Forbes v. Forbes, decided by Vice-Chancellor Wood, 1 Kay 341, and already adverted to, but even then, there were many circumstances which upon investigation greatly preponderated in favour of the English domicil, and that was decided to prevail at the time of the testator's death. In that case the testator had a mansion and estate in Scotland where he constantly resided, but at the same time possessed the lease of a house in London, and kept an establishment of servants, and also resided there from time to time; but still there were so many circumstances operating both ways, namely, the domicil of origin being Scotch, the position which the testator held in Scotland, and the duties he fulfilled there, as to make it extremely doubtful whether the domicil was not Scotch, had it not been that his wife resided mainly in London, and his establishment in Scotland consisted of servants hired for the time only; and upon these two facts, but chiefly upon the first, the domicile was held to be English. In reference to this circumstance the case of Warrender v. Warrender, 2 Cl. & Fin. 536, was cited, in which the principle was recognised, that the wife's presence regulates the domicile, although rebutted by the circumstance of the parties being separate; but under ordinary circumstances, the place where the wife resides must certainly be looked upon as the "home" of the parties. In observing upon this principle, Vice-Chancellor Wood happily remarked that the wife must certainly be regarded as the tutelary genius of a man's house, and stand in the place of the lares of old; and it was considered on all the authorities as an almost decisive circumstance to determine the domicile, that it was the residence of the wife, she being, as it were, indivisible from the family and establishment. In cases of this kind, the slightest circumstance has weight, because, although slight in itself, yet, coupled with other facts, also, alone, equally slight; it may have in that way considerable influence, even retrospectively, in determining which of two domicils shall prevail. In such a case it is very doubtful whether domicile of origin would not, simpliciter, as such, have a preponderance, although the question rests on evidence which must necessarily vary in every case. In the case of Lord v. Colein before referred to, the most voluminous evidence was pretty equally balanced, and domicile of origin was held to prevail. Although it seems to be assumed that length of time, or diuturnity of residence, as it is called, is alone sufficient to determine a domicile, yet in the case of two equal domicils, it is doubtful whether that would be so, inasmuch as a man might regard both as equally in the light of a home, chance circumstances only causing the residence in duration in the one to outweigh that in the other, and therefore, it appears to be necessary that more than one circumstance must be adduced to give a preference, although any circumstance going to show that the party considered one of the two his home, would of course guide the decision as to that one being the domicile. Upon the whole, we may conclude that in the case of two or more equal domicils, that is, both being residences, the fact of the wife residing, a fixed establishment of servants, spending the greater part of the year there, say the winter months, and using the other as a summer resort for change or recreation only, would be sufficient to determine in favour of one over the other, it not being possible to lay down any positive rule, except such as may be applied upon general principles. And where the circumstances are so balanced as to make it impossible to decide which was the preponderance, then the domicile of origin turns the scale.

In another place I have referred to the case of The Inhabitants of Abington v. The Inhabitants of Bridgewater, 23 Pickering American Reports, 170; and as to another point, but in the same case are some striking dicta relating to the question of two domicils to this effect. Two considerations must be kept steadily in view, first, that every person must have a domicile somewhere, and secondly, that a man can have only one domicile for one purpose, at one and the same time. Every one has a domicile of origin which he retains until he acquires another, and the one thus acquired is in like manner retained; and the supposition that a man can have two domicils would lead to the absurdest consequences. If he had two domicils within the limits of distant sovereign states in case of war, that which would be an act of imperative duty in one would make him a traitor to the other, as not only sovereigns, but all their subjects, collectively and individually, are put into a state of hostility by war. He would become an enemy to himself, and bound to commit hostilities, and afford protection to the same persons and property at the same time. But, suppose he was domiciled within two military districts of the same state, he would be bound to do personal service at two places at the same time, and in two countries, and he would be compellable on peril of attachment to serve on juries in two remote shire towns, or in two towns to do watch and ward in two different places; or suppose he was removed by a warrant to the place of his settlement or residence, it would follow that two sets of civil officers would be bound to remove him by force, each acting under a legal warrant; these are, therefore, rather postulata than propositions to be proved, yet they go far in furnishing a test by which the question may be tried in each particular case. It depends not upon proving particular facts, but whether all the facts and circumstances taken together tend to show that a man has his home or domicile in one place, and overbalance all the like proofs tending to establish it in another. Such an inquiry, therefore, enables a comparison of proofs, and in making that comparison there are some facts which the law deems decisive, unless controlled and corrected by others still more stringent. It will be seen by these observations what the view taken by the American judges is of the possibility of two subsisting domicils; and it seems to me that they are of considerable value.

CHAP. X.

THE EFFECT WHICH DOMICIL HAS IN RESPECT OF FOREIGN CONTRACTS.

Inasmuch as the law of domicile operates upon foreigners as well as natural born subjects of a state, it becomes a matter of some importance to consider what effect the acts of a party domiciled in another country would have in this country, or upon the continent. This question would generally have its origin in acts of a mixed character, that is, where part of such acts came within the foreign law, and part within the law of the place of domicile. Suppose a person domiciled in England (for it is with reference to the view our law takes that this question is discussed) goes abroad, but without losing the English domicile, and does acts, partly according to the law of the country where he or she then is, and partly according to our law; if the acts done according to the foreign law are connected with and depend upon the acts done according to the English law, a court of equity in this country will hold the foreign acts binding according to the law of that country; and personal property belonging to a party domiciled in England will be administered by English courts of equity, although dealt with by instruments invalid according to the foreign law of the country in which the instrument is made; that is, the law of this country will both take cognizance of and act upon contracts entered into in a foreign form by a party domiciled in England, and carry out all other acts not recognized by the law of a foreign country, but in the English form. This question was argued in the case of Este v. Smyth, 18 Jur. 300; 2 W. R. 148, before the present Master of the Rolls. In that case a marriage took place in Paris according to the English form; both parties being domiciled in England, and a contract was entered into to settle property, partly charged on real estates in England, and in the French form and language. Each party contributed to the amount settled, which was to be held in common according to the custom of Paris, which the parties agreed should prevail with respect to it, wherever they should happen to reside. It was also agreed that the surplus of what should belong to each of them, together with whatever should come to them, whether moveable or immovable during the coverture, should belong to the said intended husband and wife respectively biens personnels, i.e., to their separate use. Between the date of the contract, and the time of the marriage the Code

Napoleon was promulgated, and it was admitted that it came within the terms of that code. The parties very shortly separated, and the wife made a will in the English form expressed to be "in pursuance of all powers enabling her in that behalf" giving legacies, and the residue to the plaintiff, and died, and the will was proved in Canterbury (vide Este v. Este, 3 Robertson 351;) some of the property settled was raisable by trustees, but in consequence of the opposition of the husband they refused to raise it, and this Bill was filed in consequence, and the questions were, first, whether, there being no valid marriage by the law of France, the contract made in contemplation of a French marriage was or was not subsisting; and whether the husband was entitled to the wife's personal property under his marital right? Or, in the alternative, whether, supposing the contract valid, it gave the wife power to dispose of her property in the English form? The opinions of eminent French avocats were taken on these questions. The Master of the Rolls thought that the parties were competent, in anticipation of an English marriage, to contract that their rights should be regulated by the laws of any country they chose; but that the effect of the contract upon French property was not within the jurisdiction of the court to decide. He then considered the effect of the contract, with reference to the English property, and construed it according to the French law, and declared the will valid inasmuch as it had been proved in England, and therefore declared valid by a competent court. The summary of this part of the subject is, that a domicile puts the party in possession of exactly the same rights as a natural born subject would have, and the domicile is a sufficient substratum to enable the enforcement of contracts, not only in the form and according to the law of the country where the domicile exists, but of any other country where the domiciled party may be temporarily residing. The case of De Verne v. Routledge, Sirey's (French) Reports, 1852, is in point on this question upon this part of the subject, and will be found extracted in the case of Bremer v. Bremer, 1 Deane. Eccles. 200. The 13th article of the Code Napoleon is as follows:—"L'étranger qui aura été admis pour le Gouvernement à établir son domicile en France y jouira de tous les droits civils tout qu'il continuera d'y résider." That is, a stranger receiving the authorization of the Government, and establishing a domicile in France, can enjoy all civil rights, including of course the power of executing legal documents. Demolombe's Cours de Code Civil, p. 143-4; Code Napoleon, 319. In the case of Watts v. Shrimpton, 21 Beav. 97, an Englishwoman had married a domiciled Frenchman, and articles were executed in the English form previously to the marriage, under which the wife was entitled to £200 per annum. The husband afterwards separated from her, and the French court condemned her for adultery, and it was held that the contract of marriage was English, and the rights of the parties were to be regulated by the English law, and further that the property of the wife having fallen into possession, and the moral conduct of both parties being reprehensible, the income of the fund must be equally divided between them. It must be confessed that this case is somewhat singular in its principle; for it recognizes the contract, marriage, &c., as English, and yet adjudicates upon the breach of it, according to the French law, and further than that proceeds as to the decision of the case, both on the assumption of the marriage as valid according to the English law, and the offence of the wife according to the French; and then sums up all by taking into consideration the conduct of both parties, from which the conclusion is unavoidable that where a native of England marries a person domiciled in France, and the marriage and its concomitants are according to the English law, not only will the French law recognize the English marriage as binding, and punish for an offence in breach of its obligations, but the English courts will adjudicate upon the footing of the judgment of the French courts as to the adultery; and also take into consideration extraneous circumstances. It is not difficult, however, to see upon what reasoning the French law proceeds, namely, that for the purpose of merely trying the question of adultery, the fact is distinct from the marriage, although it recognizes a foreign contract as binding upon a domiciled subject of France, by implication, inasmuch as it condemns the other party for infidelity, which it could not do without assuming the marriage as valid. The Code Civil is a perfect model of simplicity and perspicuity, and yet cases and authorities have so multiplied that I believe the French law is now admitted to be in a most unsatisfactory condition, and this is somewhat embarrassing, because, for some purposes it is impossible to avoid recognizing foreign contracts made with a British subject; for, of course, to do otherwise would be seriously to affect moral relations, where innocent parties are concerned, which no system of laws, founded on equitable principles, would for a moment sanction. I think, there can be no doubt that a marriage solemnized according to the law of the native country of one of the parties is binding upon both, and that would extend to all contracts made between them in good faith, and without anything to render them inequitable, and the authorities show that the domicile of a party, though merged in that of the other party by a foreign contract, yet will so far be recognized as to uphold a contract made according to the laws of the country of which the party so losing the domicile is a native, except so far as the laws of that country considered the party under disability by reason of coverture, conviction, infancy, or incapacity. In the case of Strathmore v. Bowes, 4 Will. & Shaw, App. 89, it was not questioned that where a man's domicile was Scotch, if he did acts in England which would amount to a legal marriage, if he were then in Scotland, and his domicile was Scotch at his death, the marriage was legal. In that case the question was whether a child was legitimate so as to inherit a title, which I take as distinct from the general question of legitimacy for any other purpose, because it was distinctly held in exactly the same circumstances that a child would be legitimate, Robins v. Paston, 6 W. R. 457.

Upon the general state of law as existing between us and our continental neighbours, it may not be superfluous to quote some observations which appeared in a French journal of September 1867, with reference to the "legal status of an Englishman in France.—With reference to a case—that of Parkinson v. Bedene—which has lately come before the civil tribunal at Paris, the plaintiff's solicitor, Mr. Margary, addresses to Galignani's Messager the following general statement of the existing law:—"Great facilities are given by the law of France for the arrest of a foreigner when the creditor is a Frenchman, and many an unfortunate Englishman has been incarcerated upon overdue bills of exchange (often obtained from him fraudulently) endorsed to a Frenchman. As, however, in the majority of cases the party is not a bona fide holder for valuable consideration, but merely a man of straw who lends his name for the occasion (technically called a prête nom), the debtor generally succeeds in obtaining his liberation on showing to the court the real nature of the transaction, and getting the arrest declared illegal. This, however, requires some time to effect, as, if he succeeds in the Tribunal de Commerce, the nominal creditor appeals to the Cour Impériale, and months elapse before a final judgment can be obtained. In the meantime the unfortunate debtor must remain in prison, unless he can deposit the amount claimed in the Caisse des Consignations, or give bail; and, as the surety is not only answerable, as in England, for the appearance of the debtor, but also for the payment of the debt and costs in case judgment is given against him and he is unable to meet the demand, it is almost impossible for a foreigner to find a substantial person willing to undertake responsibility. In England no distinction is made as to liability to arrest between a British subject and a foreigner, as neither can be arrested on mesne process (that is, before judgment), unless the creditor can prove, to the satisfaction of a judge, that the debtor intends to leave the country. Art. 11, tit. 1, liv. 1, of the Code Napoleon says:—'L'étranger jouira en France des mêmes droits civils que ceux qui sont ou seront accordés aux Français par les traités de la nation à laquelle cet étranger appartiendra.' It is not, however, sufficient that certain rights are accorded to Frenchmen by the laws of a foreign country for the subjects of that country to enjoy the same privileges in France, the reciprocity must be expressly stipulated for by treaty (see Rogron's note on this article in his Code Civil Expliqué). Now, no treaty exists which puts Frenchmen in England, and Englishmen in France, upon an equality as to arrest for debt, the former enjoying in England the same privilege in that respect as a British subject purely and simply by the law of the land. It strikes me, however, that if the case were brought officially to the notice of the French Government they would admit the equity of the claim of British subjects to enjoy in France the same privileges as the law of England accords to Frenchmen in that country, and the cordial alliance which now exists between the two nations, the high sense of justice of the Emperor of the French, and the well-known zeal of our ambassador at Paris, seem to render the present moment peculiarly favourable for obtaining the desired object."

OXFORD CIRCUIT.—GLOUCESTER.

The commission was opened in this town on the 2nd instant by Mr. Justice Blackburn. The cause list contained an entry of twenty-two causes, seven of which were marked for special juries.

MONMOUTH.

The commission was opened in this town by Mr. Baron Wilde on the 28th ult. The cause list contains an entry of only five causes.

WESTERN CIRCUIT.—BRISTOL.

The commission was opened in this city by Mr. Baron Martin on the 28th ult. There were 15 causes entered for trial.

NORTH WALES AND CHESTER CIRCUIT.—CHESTER.

Mr. Baron Channell opened the commission in this city on the 31st ult. The civil list contained only 9 entries.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

The April quarter sessions commenced on the 1st inst. at Clerkenwell, before Mr. Bodkin, assistant judge, Mr. Payne, deputy, Mr. Pownall, chairman of the bench, and a large number of justices.

The calendar was somewhat heavy.

It is rumoured that Mr. Frederick Dawes Danvers, the clerk of the council and registrar of the Duchy of Lancaster has retired, and that Mr. J. H. Gooch, the chief assistant in the office, will succeed him.

Mr. James Consedine, of No. 58, Pall-Mall, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas.

Mr. George Kirby, of Bicester, Oxford, has been appointed a commissioner to administer oaths in the High Court of Chancery in England.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

RESTRICTION OF GENERAL POWER OF APPOINTMENT TO OBJECTS CONTEMPLATED BY SETTLEMENT.

Peover v. Hassall, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 399.—Eland v. Baker, M. R., 9 W. R. 444.

The first of the above cases raised the difficult and important question, whether, seeing that the purposes and objects of marriage settlements are obviously to provide for children, any words, however large, purporting to give power to either parent to deal with the settled property in disherison of the children, can be read in any other way than for the benefit of the children. In dealing with this question Vice-Chancellor Wood bestowed a good deal of consideration on the case of Bristow v. Warde, 2 Ves. Jun. 336. In that case the question was not between children and strangers, but between children and more remote issue, and further the power to which the Court gave a limited construction was contained in pre-nuptial articles and not in a formal deed. By the articles a money fund was agreed to be settled upon trust for the husband for the joint lives of him and his wife; and if he should die first leaving issue by her, for the wife for life; and after her decease to apply the capital in such manner as he should appoint; and in default of appointment to divide the same among the issue equally at twenty-one, with maintenance and survivorship. After the marriage an estate purchased with the fund was settled upon the husband for the joint lives of him and his wife; remainder to trustees, to preserve, &c.; remainder, in case of his death first without issue, to certain uses; remainder, in case of his death first leaving any child or children, to the wife for life; remainder to all the child or children in such shares as the husband should appoint; for want of appointment equally in tail with cross remainders; remainder to the heirs of the husband. The husband died leaving the wife surviving, and having by his will appointed shares to children for life with remainder to their children as they should appoint. It was held that this was an excess of power. Lord Loughborough in giving judgment said, "The first consideration is, what is the construction of the articles? I was at first struck with the idea that was urged that the extent of the articles gave him a larger power than the settlement afterwards made, purporting to be in pursuance of the articles, had left him. But it is clear upon the articles he had no more power under them than what he took to himself under the settlement executed with regard to the bulk of the money. The articles were made in order to secure a provision for the intended wife, and the issue of the marriage. That is the object of all marriage articles. . . . But it was contended that the power here is indefinite as to its objects. It would be a forced construction of articles to hold that a provision to be made for children, in default of appointment to be equally distributable, in the case of, an appointment, should be subject to his debts; which would be the necessary consequence of holding that he had an indefinite power of appointing, only providing for the jointure of the wife; for if he had that indefinite power, it would be assets; he might appoint to any one; his creditors could affect it; and if he executed his power for the children, the children must take it subject to the debts of their father. It is not the natural frame of such a settlement, nor is it the construction of the words of this. It is clear the power of appointment is not indefinite, but is confined to the issue." His Lordship then went on to consider whether the word "issue" in the articles had a larger extent than "children" in the settlement; and he decided that it had not. "I am unable," he said, "to extend the construction of either the settlement or the articles beyond the children." It seemed desirable to give this full extract from the judgment of Lord Loughborough, because it has occasioned difficulty to Sir L. Shadwell, to Lord St. Leonards and to Vice-Chancellor Wood. The last-named learned judge remarks upon it that the circumstances of the case were extremely strong in favour of the decision; but that Lord Loughborough "could not be considered as laying down any general rule that, however large the words of the power in a marriage settlement, they could only be construed for the benefit of the children."

Another instance in which the generality of a power was restrained by regard to the context of the settlement and to the circumstances is to be found in the Irish case of Cooke v. Briscoe (1 Dru. & Walsh 596). In that case a person on his second marriage executed a deed of settlement, whereby certain lands were vested in trustees to the use of the settlor for life; then to secure a jointure for his intended wife; and subject thereto to the use of the first and every other son of the settlor by his intended wife; with a proviso that if the settlor should have more than one son he should have full power and authority by deed or will to prefer such son or sons to the whole or part of the settled lands, subject to the jointure for his said wife, and also subject to all such sums of money not exceeding £4,000 as the settlor might think proper to charge thereon by deed or will. The settlor executed this power, and charged the lands with the sum of £4,000 in favour of the children of his former marriage. Lord Chancellor Sugden, in giving judgment, said, that "the instrument before him was very clumsily and inaccurately framed; but it was quite clear that the power of charging the £4,000 could arise only in the event of there being more than one son of the intended marriage, and one of such sons being in possession of the whole or part of the lands by virtue of the powers of preferring such son or sons reserved to the father. The words of the deed were directly to this effect, and the object of the settlement would be defeated by giving them the construction contended for by the plaintiff; inasmuch as the lands were not worth more than £4,000, and so the eldest son of the marriage would be left, in the event of there being more than one son, without any certain provision. The construction relied on by the defendant was therefore sustained by the words of the deed. It also appeared more rational than that contended for by the plaintiff; for if the eldest son became liable to be displaced by the birth of a second son, and the provision intended for him by the marriage-settlement so far liable to be defeated, it would not be unreasonable to enable the father to make a provision for the eldest son so displaced by charging a sum not exceeding the value of the inheritance; and though the settlement did not secure that the power so given to the father should be exercised in the whole or in part in favour of the eldest son, yet it left the father at liberty to make provision for him and for the other branches of the family. However this might be, the words of the settlement clearly confined the power to the event of another son or sons of the said marriage being born, and in possession by virtue of the power of preferring reserved in that event to the father; and there being now no younger son, and the power not having been effectually exercised by giving a preference to any of them while they were in existence, the plaintiff's claim could not be sustained." Vice-Chancellor Wood remarked upon this case that it "required much consideration." The effect of it appears to be that the state of circumstances had not arisen under which the power was to become exercisable, because there was only one son of the second marriage, who survived the father. But if there had been more than one son, then it seems that the power would have been well exercised, although the money raised under it might have been given to the children of the first marriage. Thus the existence of a second family was necessary to the exercise of the power, and yet it was not necessary that the power should be exercised for their benefit. The case, so far as it goes, seems to be an authority for holding that the words of a power may be too large to be controlled by the general intention in favour of children prevailing in marriage settlements. The report, however, is not very intelligible, and the settlement is a miracle of blundering.

In the case of Peover v Hassall, an estate was settled to the use of the wife and husband successively for life, and after the death of the survivor, if there should be any children or issue living of the marriage, to such uses as the husband should appoint; in default of appointment to the children as tenants in common in tail; in default of all such issue to such uses as the wife should appoint, and in default of appointment to her right heirs. Children were born of the marriage and survived their parents. Those parents appointed and conveyed to a mortgagee who (the parents being now dead) sought to foreclose the children. Vice-Chancellor Wood observed that the words of this power were as large as possible, and that it might have been so framed out of confidence reposed in the husband. He considered that Bristow v. Wurde had not a general application, and he also took the distinction between a question arising upon articles and upon an executed deed. In the absence of any general principle by which such words as those before him could be cut down, he held that the interests of the children had been displaced by the exercise of the power.

The case of Eland v. Baker, before the Master of the Rolls, contains some expressions which contrast strongly with the above reasoning, although we do not apprehend that there would be any difficulty in reconciling the two decisions. By the settlement which came in question in that case, freehold and other property was conveyed by the wife's father upon trust for the wife and husband successively for life, and then for the children according to appointment, and in default, equally. The settlement contained a power to the wife's father, the husband and wife, and after the death of the wife's father, to the husband and wife jointly, with the consent of the trustees, to revoke all the uses of the settlement and to declare new uses. This power was expressed in general terms. The husband afterwards borrowed a sum of money of one of the trustees upon the security of a deed, whereby the wife's father, the husband and wife, with the consent of all the trustees, revoked the uses of the settlement (so far as was necessary for the purpose of that deed) and appointed the property to the lending trustee by way of mortgage with power of sale. A purchaser under this power of sale objected that the mortgage deed disclosed a breach of trust, and the Master of the Rolls refused to compel him to take the title. His Honour thought that a mere power of revocation of all the uses, so as to give back the whole to the settlor, might, perhaps, have been validly exercised. But the deed went on to authorise the limitation of new uses. "How must the estate be relimited? To what trusts and with what declarations? To trusts for the benefit of the persons who are the cestuis que trust of the instrument according to the true scope and intention of the deed itself." These words of the Master of the Rolls certainly do not fall far short of enunciating that very principle which Vice-Chancellor Wood could not find in the authorities brought before him. There is, however, this important feature in the case at the Rolls, that the consent of the trustees was necessary to the revocation and new appointment. It may fairly be said that the discretion of the trustees is to be exercised for the benefit of their cestuis que trust, and not for the destruction of their interests. Still trustees are, so to speak, the machinery of a marriage-settlement; and if trustees must act for the protection and not for the impoverishment of the issue of the marriage, may it not be said with equal justice that the operation of the settlement itself ought to be limited by the same principle? The Master of the Rolls went on to notice that the trustee himself was the person who advanced the money; that he bought the estate (for a mortgage was the same, in principle, as a sale); and that he exercised his discretion for the purpose of getting the estate himself, although paying for it. Upon this latter ground of the trustee himself becoming the mortgagee, probably no lawyer will doubt the soundness of the decision which refused to force the title on a purchaser.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF EXECUTION—EFFECT OF A C.A. SA.—ACTION AGAINST A GARNISHEE.

Jorralde v. Parker, Exch., 9 W. R. 347.

The point established here has often been raised at chambers, and has there invariably been decided in the same way as it has now been settled by the Full Court. It arises under the garnishee clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, by which a plaintiff is enabled to seize or attach any of the execution debtor's available assets—that is to say, the debts which are owed to him by a third party; and under which, to allow him to make such debts available, the plaintiff may sue such third party (or garnishee) himself. The present case, however, shows that proceeding against the garnishee will be of no avail if the debt owing to the defendant in the original action has become extinguished; or even if the remedy therefor has become barred. For here, the original defendant had already taken the garnishee in execution for the debt attached; and a plea by the garnishee, alleging this fact as an answer to the action brought against him by the plaintiff in the original proceedings, was, on demurrer, held good by the Court without calling upon the counsel, relying on such plea to support it. The principle of law decisive of the point will be found in Burnaby's Case (1 Str. 653), to the effect that to take the body of a debtor in execution satisfies the debt in point of law. For if a debt owing to A. be satisfied as regards A., it cannot of course be revived in favour of B.

LIABILITY OF MASTER TO SERVANT—CASE OF Priestley v. Fowler CONSIDERED.

Riley v. Buzendale, Exch., 9 W. R. 347; Holmes v. Clark ib. 419.

There are, probably, few single decisions which have laid the foundation for so much litigation as the well known one of Priestley v. Fowler (3 Mee. & W. 1). The proposition established by it was to the effect that (as the general rule, and subject to the exceptions to which we are about to refer), a servant takes upon himself the risks of his employment, and cannot hold the master responsible if an injury should happen to the servant in the course of, and consequent upon, the service. It is strange that such an important principle as this should have for the first time been judicially recognised in the year 1837. But such appears to be the fact. In that case not a single authority was cited, either by the bench or at the bar; and, indeed, the Chief Baron, in commenting upon it with reference to the last of the two cases mentioned above, observes that it was one "of the first impression, and which has given rise to what may be almost now called a new branch of the law." But it often happens that a broad proposition of law thus laid down, shortly becomes the foundation of a numerous crop of decisions extending or limiting its applicability; and such has been the event with respect to the decision in Priestley v. Fowler. For in the first place, it has been settled that the rule does not prevent a master from being liable, if he causes the hurt complained of by his personal negligence or interference (see Robert v. Smith, 2 H. & N. 213). It also appears to be established that the master may be liable if the injury has been the result of his not having taken due care to expose his servant to no unreasonable risk (see Marshall v. Steward, H. of L. March, 1855, cited in "Broom's Com. on the Com. Law," 2nd ed. p. 686), and both of the cases to which the present remarks refer are illustrative of this qualification of the rule; for in both of them, the action was brought by a servant against his master for an injury received by defective machinery; and though in one of them the action failed, in the other case the servant succeeded in keeping a verdict he obtained for large damages.

Many of the facts in these two cases were the same. In both the injury was caused by machinery, which, though sufficient for its purpose at the time of the plaintiff entering the defendant's service, became afterwards unsafe, and was allowed by the master to remain in that condition. But in the first case, the servant appears to have made no complaint, but to have continued in his employment, notwithstanding the danger to which he must have known himself exposed. In Holmes v. Clark, on the contrary, the servant did complain more than once, and received a promise that the defective machinery should be remedied. In this appears to be the essential difference between the equity of the two cases; but (as sometimes happens) they were decided on technical grounds rather than on considerations of justice as between the individual litigants. For in Riley v. Baxendale, since there was no complaint made, nor any personal negligence or interference on the part of the master, the plaintiff endeavoured to help out his case by framing his declaration as upon a contract on the part of the defendant not to expose him (the defendant) to any extraordinary danger in the course of his employment; but at the trial nothing beyond an ordinary hiring could be proved, and he was accordingly nonsuited. No application was made at the trial to amend the declaration by striking out the allegation as to the special terms of hiring; but at the argument with respect to setting aside the nonsuit, it was intimated by all the Court that such an amendment, had it been applied for, would not have been granted; and that no encouragement would be given to attempt to multiply the cases in which masters are responsible to their servants for injuries received by them in the course of their employ—in other words, to weaken the rule laid down in Priestley v. Fowler by introducing unnecessary qualifications.

But in Holmes v. Clark the same Court gave judgment for the plaintiff, because a qualification of the rule seemed, under the circumstances, necessary. There had, indeed, been no express terms of hiring; but the defendant had not only been guilty of disregarding certain precautions required by Act of Parliament with regard to the machinery used, but had continued to work it while unsafe and after being remonstrated with by the plaintiff, and after having engaged to remedy the evil complained of. And the accident having happened before this pledge had been redeemed, and without any negligence on the part of the servant, the Court held the action to be maintainable—holding that, under the circumstances, the master must be considered as having taken the risk upon himself until he chose to repair the defective machinery.

REGISTRY OF JUDGMENTS.

I have a judgment which was entered up and registered nearly five years before the passing of the Act of last session to amend the law of property. The five years have now expired, and I have re-registered it; and such re-registration is, I presume, sufficient to continue the judgment as a charge upon my debtor's freehold property.

I want, also, to charge his leasehold property, and have issued a writ of execution for that purpose. On tendering it, however, for registry in the register of executions established under the above-mentioned Act of last session, the officer refuses to register it there, on the ground that he is instructed not to enter in it executions upon judgments which were entered up prior to the passing of the aforesaid Act of last session.

What am I to do in order to bind my debtor's leasehold property? Must I actually lodge the writ in the sheriff's hands? I fear that since the decision in Westbrook v. Blythe, 3 El. & Bl. 737, and the refusal to enter it in the register of executions, I have no alternative.

Can some of your learned contributors who have furnished valuable articles on the subject of judgments, enlighten me and some of my fellow practitioners, who are in the same difficulty with myself, on the point?

Will you permit me to ask, at the same time, whether any effectual steps have been taken to remedy the blunder in sect. 2 of the before-mentioned Act of last session, which requires the registry of executions to be kept in the plaintiffs' names, and in alphabetical order (instead of in the defendants' names)? In consequence of which I am obliged now, in order to ascertain whether a writ of execution has issued against a particular debtor, to search the register of executions from beginning to end in the name of every one of the plaintiffs, in which I am not much, if at all, assisted by the fact of their being in alphabetical order.

A SOLICITOR.

London, April 4.

CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—REMUNERATION TO ATTORNEYS.

Seeing a paragraph in your last number on the remuneration to witnesses, I am induced to give you an account of the fee I received for the labour done for conducting a prosecution for murder at the Exeter assizes some short time since.

I had eight witnesses, and the case gave me some considerable trouble in getting up. I prepared two briefs, 16 sheets each, expecting that I should be allowed to employ two counsel; but I found that I should be allowed for one only, so one brief was not used. I prepared and sent by post to the Clerk of Indictments instructions for indictment. I travelled 60 miles to the assize town and back and attended the court for four days preparing for the trial and attending the same,—and for the whole of my professional services I was rewarded by the Court with two guineas only!

Who will conduct a prosecution after this?

A DEVONSHIRE ATTORNEY.

EXAMINATION OF ARTICLED CLERKS.

The importance of the above subject, both to those who have been already admitted members of the legal profession and also to those who purpose so to be, induces me, as one of the latter class, to trespass shortly on your valuable space, for the purpose of enabling me to make a few remarks upon two letters that appeared under the same heading in your last week's impression. The first of these is signed "An Articled Clerk," and the writer, after telling us that his remarks are "necessarily interested," goes on to state that he has been a clerk for eighteen years, a managing clerk for the last nine, and has just commenced his service under articles. He then enumerates many weighty and important matters in which he has been latterly engaged; and concludes the first part of his letter by appealing to the great confidence reposed in him both by clients and employer. He next informs us that he was brought up in "a remote inland county," where, twenty years ago, parents thought next to nothing of a classical education; and that, notwithstanding his alleged success in business, he went to the office totally ignorant of either ancient or modern languages, knowing nothing of mathematics, and, in his own words, "acquainted with nothing more than the rudiments of a very limited English education;" and, as though to clear up all doubts as to his present attainments, he finally tells us that since that time he has had no opportunity of improving himself with regard to these (probably in his opinion) unimportant matters. Then comes a great deal about the hardships and unfairness of requiring a classical examination from a gentleman of his unquestionable legal attainments, and, according to his own showing, equally undoubted general ignorance.

But the answer to this bitter complaint of the injustice of the proposed examination is simply this, that this gentleman, in common with all others recently articulated, knew perfectly well when he signed his articles a few months ago that an examination in general knowledge was pending, and had been called for by the almost unanimous voice of the profession; and if he did not feel equal to the trial he should have been contented to remain a managing clerk; which position seems to me to suit him exactly, and which, by his own confession, he fills so entirely to his own and others' satisfaction.

And if this reply fails to convince your correspondent of the absurdity of his quarrel, I would ask your readers whether they think that the admission of a gentleman of the above capabilities would be likely to be, directly, a benefit to the profession, or, indirectly, would tend to raise its tone by inducing gentlemen of education and position to enter it?

To the writer of the second letter, who signs himself X. Y. Z., I only say that probably a second perusal of the report of the committee of the Incorporated Law Society will convince him that neither Greek nor German are absolutely necessary requirements to enable him to pass the proposed examination, and that they will only be expected from those candidates who fail in other and less difficult subjects.

ANOTHER ARTICLED CLERK.

Review.

The Law List for 1861. Compiled by WILLIAM WILKS DALBIAC, of the Inland Revenue Office, Registrar of Certificates. London: V. & R. Stevens & Sons.

Since the passing of the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, this work has become of considerable importance to the profession. By section 22 of that Act it is enacted that "Any list of attorneys, solicitors, and conveyancers, purporting to be published by the authority of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and to contain the names of attorneys, solicitors, and conveyancers who have obtained stamped certificates for the current year on or before the 1st day of January in the same year, shall, until the contrary be made to appear, be evidence in all courts, and before all justices of the peace and others, that the persons named therein as attorneys, solicitors, or conveyancers holding such certificates as aforesaid for the current year, are attorneys, solicitors, or conveyancers holding such certificates; and the absence of the name of any person from such list, shall, until the contrary be made to appear, be evidence as aforesaid, that such person is not qualified to practise as an attorney, solicitor, or conveyancer, under a certificate for the current year; but in the case of any person being an attorney or solicitor whose name does not appear in such list, an extract from the Roll of Attorneys and Solicitors kept by the registrar certified under the hand of the secretary of the Incorporated Law Society (while such society performs the duties of registrar), or of the registrar for the time being, shall be evidence as aforesaid of the facts appearing in such extract; and in the case of any person being a conveyancer whose name does not appear in such list, the fact of his being so shall be proved in the way in which it is now by law required to be proved."

In addition to that portion of the work usually supplied by the registrar of stamped certificates, the compiler has introduced much useful information upon many subjects interesting to the profession. Among the most important additions we observe that the date of the admission of each attorney, proctor, and notary has been prefixed to his name. So far as the public is concerned, this new feature may not be of much value; but it will often be convenient for purposes of professional intercourse. A complete alphabetical list of the London commissioners to administer oaths in Chancery, the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, has also been added. This has long been a desideratum, and will prove of the greatest convenience to the profession. We have frequently had the subject brought under our notice, and intended at a convenient opportunity to have published a similar list. We are happy, however, to find that the necessity for our labour in that respect has been superseded by the work now under notice.

RECENT DEATHS.

The Right Hon. Richard Wilson Greene, whose death was announced last week, was for many years one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and had only retired from the active duties of that position a few months before the disorder under which he had long suffered terminated his life. The ex-baron was born about the year 1791, and was called to the Bar in 1814, and after passing through the grades of Serjeant-at-Law and Solicitor-General, became the leader in the Court of Chancery, and in 1852 was deservedly promoted to the bench by Lord Derby. Baron Greene's connection with the law was hereditary, his father, Sir Jonas Greene, having been Recorder of Dublin. He was regarded as a deeply-read lawyer, and a very able and painstaking judge, and has left behind him few judicial personages who are so thoroughly respected by the bar and the public. In private life he was singularly amiable, and of a most retiring disposition. The last time that the present writer saw Baron Greene, the subject of conversation was the duration of life in the several professions, suggested by an article that had appeared in one of the reviews; and he discussed the topic with all the manner of a man who was near the close of a well-spent life, and regarded its termination with a hopeful tranquillity. A large concourse of judicial and legal personages were present at his interment in the family vault attached to St. Peter's Church, Dublin.

Sir Matthew Barrington, Baronet, of Glenstal Castle, who died on the 31st of March, at the residence of his son-in-law, in Pembroke-street, was undoubtedly for a quarter of a century one of the leading solicitors in Ireland. The firm of Barrington, Jeffers, & Co., of which he was the head, had conducted the legal business of the Great Southern and Western Railway, and of several branch and other railways, from their very commencement; and had prepared and carried through far more railway bills than any other Irish firm. In addition to these engagements, the deceased baronet had at an early age been so fortunate as to obtain the very lucrative appointment of Crown Solicitor on the Munster Circuit, an office worth two or three thousand a-year, but which will in future be superseded by the nomination of separate Crown solicitors for the several counties. Sir M. Barrington died at the age of 71, and is succeeded in his title, and in his estates in the county of Limerick, by his eldest son W. H. Barrington.

The death is also announced of Mr. Felton F. W. Harvey, her Majesty's Inspector of Irish Prisons, formerly captain in the 13th Light Dragoons. This much-respected gentleman was son-in-law to Acheson Lyle (late a master in chancery), and has been prematurely taken away at the age of thirty-five.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Among the few Acts of Parliament which have received the Royal assent during the present session is one of some importance to persons having transactions in the public funds. On the 22nd of last month, the 24 Vict. cap. 3 was added to the statute-book, and it has already, in several important particulars, come into operation. The two main objects of the statute are to make certain alterations in the mode of paying the Bank of England, and in the management of the public debt, and also to give increased facilities for the transfer of the public stocks. Heretofore, as our readers are aware, the transfer books were closed for a month prior to the day fixed for the payment of the half-yearly dividend. The object of this regulation was, to give time for the calculation of the dividends, and for the preparation of warrants. During that period no transfers were permitted, except under circumstances of special necessity, and even then the stock so transferred always carried the right to the current half-year's dividend. It has been, however, enacted by the recent statute that henceforth the Bank may close the transfer books on any day in the month preceding that in which the dividends shall be payable; and the persons who, on the day of the closing of such books, are inscribed as proprietors are to be entitled to the current dividend; but transferees after the day of the closing of the books are not to be entitled to that dividend. The effect will be, that persons holding stock on the morning of the day when the books are closed, say on the 1st of June next, will be entitled to the dividend which will fall due on the 5th of July; but in the meanwhile, transfers may be made in the usual way, and as if the books were not closed. This arrangement will be very convenient for the public, but especially so for suitors in the Court of Chancery. The frequent intervals in which dealings in stock were impracticable to the Court very much impeded the course of its business.

A Select Committee of the House of Lords has commenced taking evidence on questions connected with the law of divorce and dissolution of marriage. We are not aware whether the scope of the inquiries committed to their lordships includes the constitution and business of Her Majesty's Court of Divorce, as at present constituted, under Sir C. Cresswell. But it is not unlikely, owing to the arrears of the Cause List in that Court, that some change will soon be made either in its constitution or its business. Various suggestions have been offered on this subject, but we have not yet noticed one which appears to afford the best solution for the present difficulty—we mean the transfer to the Court of Chancery of the metropolitan Probate business. The forms and procedure incidental to the proving of wills and the granting and revocation of letters of administration are much more cognate to the ordinary business of courts of equity than to the litigation in suits for judicial separation or dissolution of marriage. Indeed, no little inconvenience is frequently experienced in chancery suits by the peculiar jurisdiction of the Court of Probate and its exclusive competency to constitute the legal personal representative of a deceased person. Financial reasons would also go to support the same suggestion; for, as courts of equity at present have scarcely enough of work to keep them going, they would be able, without putting the country to greater expense, to accept a transfer of the business at present done by the metropolitan Court of Probate.

The Times of Thursday last has got a very mysterious article upon the Bar and Barristers generally. It says that "matters which are discussed at every circuit table, and, indeed, at every dinner table, cannot but have their public interest and challenge some public allusion." The writer does not condescend to particulars. There can be but little doubt, however, that the text has been mainly supplied by the recent retirement from Parliament, and from a minor judicial office, of a well-known nisi prius advocate. The writer of the article in question states that the current scandals which have suggested his remarks must "pass unfixt," because they have not yet been made public. We also think it right to abstain from giving any further currency to them, although they have already obtained a very wide circulation in connection with a name which has been long well known in the profession.

THE CASE OF ST. GREGORY'S CHURCH, SUDBURY.

It has fallen to the lot of the Court of Chancery to play an unusual part in the composition of a second phase of the famous strife at Sudbury, with the particulars of which general readers are less acquainted than with the proceedings which attracted so much notice a few years ago in the case of St. Peter's Church in the same town. To lawyers the result is interesting, by its exhibiting a new application of the powers of the Court, acting as a very efficient auxiliary to the ecclesiastical authority still vested in the diocesan chancery. An attentive examination of the case shows that the powers of the Chancellor of the Diocese would have been unavailing to establish a valid compromise between the claims of the contending parties, without the convenient aid which the Great Seal, under its improved jurisdiction, has been enabled to give. At the same time the story of the conflict may not be without interest, as an example, par excellence, of the sort of struggle which a vast number of our country parishes have witnessed on a less exaggerated scale. It furnishes another proof of the wide distinctions which exist between London and country congregations, founded, we may presume, upon the essentially different character of their constitution, and of the relations which the members bear to each other. It shows the exact weight which in this instance was due to episcopal opinion and authority. It also suggests the necessity of a change in the working of the courts of the chancellors of dioceses. Although the facts may be familiar to some of our readers, they are yet perhaps worthy of being placed on record in an authentic and complete form.

It appears that the parishes of St. Peter's and St. Gregory's, Sudbury, are for church purposes united. In 1855, Mr. Molyneux was appointed to the perpetual curacy of both. All the tithes are alienated, and the whole endowment of the two is £72 a year. The sentiments of the new incumbent were no secret. He was the honorary secretary of the General Committee on the Pew System, the objects of which are—"To direct attention, through the press and otherwise, to the fatal effects of the pew system in churches upon the religious and moral condition of the people; to secure the full and free access of all classes, without respect of persons, to churches hereafter to be built in populous districts; and to enforce the fundamental principle of the parochial system—the common and equal right of all parishioners to worship in their parish church." Mr. Molyneux had also, or has since, published a letter to the Bishop of Ely, "On the Equal Rights of all Classes of Parishioners to the Use of their Parish Church, and the un-Christian results of the Appropriation of Seats." Proceedings were very soon commenced to carry out these principles at St. Peter's, the larger and more central of the two churches. Of these it is only necessary to say that they ended in the church being seated with chairs instead of pews; and the case has been alluded to in the report of the House of Lords Committee in 1858, as "an experiment which has been soberly conducted during more than three years," and as one "based on a principle of law which is applicable to every parish church in England." The subject of our present narrative, as disclosed in the suit of Cardinall v. Molyneux, just decided, was the repewing of the other church, St. Gregory's. It seems beyond doubt that the fabric of this church was in bad repair—the roof was unsafe, the floor rotten and in holes, and the woodwork of the pews decayed. The west end was also blocked up by a large gallery with an organ in it. At the time when this was erected, in 1829, or possibly before, the tower arch was filled up with a lath and plaster partition. The west window was partly bricked up, so as to convert the space under the tower into a lumber room. It was manifest that the work of renovation was partly matter of necessity, but also partly of ecclesiastical taste, into which sentiment diversity of religious feeling largely entered.

In October, 1857, a vestry meeting was summoned, at which a shilling rate for the repair of the roof was suggested and negatived; but an inquiry by some competent person into the state of the roof was proposed by way of amendment and carried, and further consideration of the repairs deferred till the Easter following. Meanwhile the church was closed. Finding the vestry impracticable, the incumbent, and his churchwarden Mr. Hasell, summoned a voluntary meeting of the parishioners, when it was proposed that Mr. Hasell should endeavour to raise subscriptions, and the meeting stood adjourned till the 18th of June. Mr. Hasell then reported that he had obtained £39 4s., of which he had himself subscribed £2 2s. The other churchwarden, the plaintiff in the suit, Mr. Cardinall, was also present. He had collected nothing, and refused to subscribe. Mr. Molyneux thus finding that the church was likely to remain permanently shut up, canvassed privately for subscriptions, which he obtained to the amount of £214 17s. 5d. The Bishop of Ely contributed £25, and the Church Building Society £80. Of the whole sum thus collected, £63 were specially to be applied, says Mr. Molyneux, to the restoration of the interior of the church, unless absolutely required for the fabric. In short, the £63 was contributed by friends of the incumbent in special aid of his particular views. Being thus supplied with funds, Mr. Molyneux employed a builder named Grimwood to repair the roof, and the work was completed on the 25th of March, 1859. Mr. Molyneux then finding that he had funds sufficient, after paying for the repairs of the roof, to remove the pews and gallery and to relay the floor, entered into another contract with Mr. Grimwood to clear away the pews, sittings, and gallery, take up the floor, and lay down a new one for £30. He directed him at the same time to proceed with the work so that the church might be ready by Easter Sunday following, the 24th of April. By this time the intentions of the incumbent were well understood in the parish, though it was alleged that his measures were taken in secret. He did not conceal, indeed, he had stated, that it was his wish to do with St. Gregory's as he has done with St. Peter's, and a strong opposition was ready at any moment to break out. The population of St. Gregory's parish is about 2,500, rather larger than that of St. Peter's; the inhabitants being principally poor weavers.

On the 30th of March open warfare commenced. Mr. Grimwood with his workmen entered the church, and proceeded, at Mr. Molyneux's direction, without the consent of either churchwarden (though Mr. Hasell afterwards said he quite approved of the proceeding, as Mr. Molyneux knew), and without the consent of the parishioners or a faculty, to "cut down, sever, and remove" the pews, sittings, and gallery; making, in fact, a clean sweep of everything within the walls. On the same day the indignant inhabitants found the walls of the town placarded with bills announcing the sale on the following day, on the market hill, of a quantity of building materials, "arising from the repairs, &c., at the church of St. Gregory." This publication seems to have given the alarm. Mr. Cardinall, the churchwarden, set off to the church, where he arrived about half-past twelve, in time to find all the pews down and the gallery removed. There was Mr. Molyneux and his curate Mr. Green. Mr. Green addressed Mr. Cardinall, and asked him whether he did not think this was an improvement. Mr. Cardinall replied, "No doubt it would be considered so if Mr. Molyneux would but have the church benched and allowed his parishioners a seat, but not to have chairs." Mr. Molyneux then apologised for not having called on Mr. Cardinall, and inquired if he did not think the church improved. Mr. Cardinall asked Mr. Molyneux if he intended boarding it. He replied as far as he could, but that chairs would be placed in the church as in St. Peter's. Mr. Molyneux then went away. Mr. Cardinall then said to Mr. Green, "What a pity it is he will not appropriate seats to his parishioners!" To which Mr. Green replied, "He won't do it, it is a hobby of his." [Mr. Green afterwards gave a different version of this conversation. His account is that Mr. Cardinall said that none of the parishioners wished to keep the pews, or would object to the alterations, if Mr. Molyneux would give up what Mr. Cardinall called his hobby.] Mr. Cardinall said he would engage to bench the church if Mr. Molyneux would agree to it; but the parishioners were determined not to come to church to sit upon chairs. He added, they had been resolved not to have the pews taken out; but had been outdone in that respect.

The following day, the 31st, was a memorable one in the annals of St. Gregory's. The parishioners had been meditating revenge, and commenced operations early. A notice had been prepared addressed to Mr. Molyneux, Mr. Grimwood, and Mr. Rolfe, the auctioneer, giving them notice not to pull down—though that had been already done—and not to remove, sell, or dispose, of the pews and sittings or materials in the church; and that it was his intention to move for an injunction. This document Mr. Cardinall served upon Mr. Grimwood, at half past eight in the morning, and also upon Mr. Molyneux and Mr. Rolfe a little later. He then repaired with a number of men to the church, where Mr. Grimwood with some dozen workmen was busy in getting out the fittings and panneling of the old pews, ready for the sale. Mr. Cardinall read the notice, and bade Mr. Grimwood desist. Mr. Grimwood laughed and said, "I will remove them in spite of you or your notice." Thereupon orders were given to the men to proceed with their work, and a fight ensued. Mr. Cardinall was knocked against an iron gate, fell down, as he says, to avoid being forced on the spikes, and was bruised and injured. One of his companions, Loft, was wounded in the face. Another was threatened with a carpenter's axe. Mr. Grimwood describes the affair as a scuffle, in which one of Mr. Cardinall's men was injured by a board falling on him.

Meanwhile, Mr. Cardinall and his party, though defeated in the churchyard, were winning the day more quietly, but more safely, in Lincoln's-inn. The bill was filed the same morning, the injunction was obtained, and a telegraphic despatch, with notice of the order restraining the sale, was hurried off with all speed to Sudbury. It was a neck-and-neck race, for the sale of the church fittings was proceeding as rapidly as the auctioneer could get through the lots. The railway clerk at Sudbury received the message at 4:35. At 4-37, as he states with ostentatious exactness, he served it upon Mr. Rolfe, who was then on the market hill in the act of selling lot 84. Mr. Rolfe, as the plaintiff's witnesses say, read the paper, knocked down the lot, and continued the sale, amidst much unusual laughter, for nearly half an hour. There were ten lots remaining. He himself declares that he put up the lot, and then began reading the message and selling the lot at the same time. When he had knocked it down, he signed the message in the usual way. He denied that he laughed, or affected to treat the notice with contempt. He swore he did not believe that lot 84, which consisted of old boards, contained anything which came out of the church, and he satisfied himself that none of the remaining ten lots formed part of the church materials before he sold them. According to the auctioneer's own statement, therefore, eleven of the lots were, by a not uncommon artifice, included among the rest, and advertised for sale as materials from St. Gregory's church, though not really forming part of such materials.

Mr. Molyneux was present, and so was Mr. Grimwood. There are great differences of statement as to whether the latter knew of the telegraphic message or not. Mr. Harding, an artist, deposed that he was present at the sale, and conversed with Mr. Grimwood. Mr. Grimwood was talking to him about the sale, and observed that he had had a regular "spree" at the church, and that he was rather too strong for Mr. Cardinall. Mr. Aprill, one of the defendant's witnesses, on the other hand, said that he saw Mr. Harding shortly before he made the above affidavit, and that he had been drinking freely before he went to the solicitor's office to do so. Other witnesses said they believed Mr. Grimwood and several of the buyers knew the contents of the message; but a Mr. Jefferies, late sergeant in the army, distinctly swore he was the first to tell him of it at seven in the evening. Meanwhile, at about five o'clock, the sale was concluded; regular notice of the injunction was served on the parties; on Mr. Grimwood, as the solicitor and his clerk said, at a quarter past five; or, as he said, at half-past six; and later in the evening on Mr. Molyneux and Mr. Rolfe. It was sworn by two of the purchasers that some of the lots were not removed until twenty minutes to six; but the auctioneer swore that there was no delivery of the lots on his part otherwise than by knocking them down. On the same evening, the 31st, notice of motion for the 4th of April, to commit Messrs. Grimwood and Rolfe for contempt of the injunction, was served on all three defendants.

Mr. Molyneux meanwhile continued his measures. He proceeded under the friendly, and afterwards the professional, advice of Mr. Butterfield, to take up the floor of the church, to open a hole in the wall for an air-drain, to throw open the lower space, and to remove the rows of bricks with which the west window was blocked up. A supplemental bill was filed on the 4th by the plaintiff, alleging these facts, and praying for another injunction. This was afterwards granted on the 21st of April. The motion to commit was to have come on at the same time, but the two applications stood over till the 12th of May.

During the interval Mr. Molyneux persevered. On the same afternoon of the 21st of April, the Thursday before Easter, Mr. Molyneux and his churchwarden, Mr. Hasell, published hand-bills announcing that though the repairs of the church were incomplete, still in order to carry out the original intention and to prevent disappointment to the parishioners, it was determined to use the church on the afternoon of Easter Sunday next. On the same day about 200 chairs were placed in the church. On the following Saturday, Mr. Cardinall and Mr. Gooday, his solicitor, proceeded to the church and were admitted. Upon entering they found Mr. Molyneux, the Rev. Mr. Green, his curate, and the Rev. Mr. Edward Pemberton, a former curate. Mr. Gooday expressed his surprise at what he saw, having understood that nothing was to be done till the hearing of the cause. He added that the arrangements of the church had been just what was complained of, and he thought Mr. Molyneux had brought himself within the terms of the injunction. To this Mr. Molyneux only bowed. The chairs were then set in rows and were being fixed with ropes. Mr. Pemberton, the late curate, followed Mr. Cardinall down the aisle, using, as the churchwarden deposed, the most irritating language, and stating that he did not care for his proceedings (Mr. Pemberton, be it observed, was no party to the suit); that they would make him (Mr. Cardinall) bankrupt for the costs, and make him pay it in gaol. Mr. Cardinall added that his solicitor remonstrated with Mr. Pemberton, and he believed it was Mr. Pemberton's wish and intention to cause a breach of the peace in the church, which Mr. Cardinall believes would have been the case had it not been for the presence of Mr. Gooday, the solicitor. On Easter Sunday, in the afternoon, service was resumed. Mr. Molyneux had no pulpit, and was obliged to preach standing on the seat of one of the stalls in the chancel.

The two motions were heard, as we have said, on the 12th of March. On the question of the injunction, an array of affidavits was filed by rival adherents on either side. The popular view, represented by the plaintiff, Mr. Cardinall, was supported by Mr. Potter, farmer; Mr. Parmenter, gentleman; Mr. Killick, a church-goer; Mr. Ely, jeweller and general dealer; Mr. Welham, provision merchant; Mr. Ginn, builder, whose brother put up the gallery; Mr. Hansell, hotel keeper; Mr. Meeking, magistrate, and late churchwarden; Mr. Jones, builder; Mr. Gross, innkeeper, who said he lived 500 yards from the church, and that he had no intimation or knowledge of the intended destruction of the interior until he saw the hand-bill on the 30th of April; Mr. Purr, member of the corporation and poor-law guardian; Mr. Sikes, magistrate, and Mr. Poley, late mayor and under-sheriff. Mr. Gooday, the solicitor, in his affidavit, described a meeting for the election of churchwardens for the parish which took place on the 28th of April. As soon as the proceedings commenced, Mr. Molyneux being in the chair, W. W. Humphrey, Esq., of Sudbury, barrister-at-law, who was a parishioner, addressed the meeting to the effect that he was an old man, and had been a life-long attendant at the parish church; that his family and children were interred within the walls; that he felt as deep an interest in the church as the incumbent; that he warned the incumbent the present proceedings would do more harm than fifty sermons would do good, and that he came there as the oldest parishioner to protest against the clandestine, violent, and lawless proceeding of the incumbent in removing the pews and gallery from the church, which he considered an aggression upon his rights and those of the other parishioners. Mr. Humphrey then left, having recorded his vote for the plaintiff, who was re-elected by a large majority.

Mr. Molyneux, on the other hand, said that out of the twenty-three deponents who had made affidavits on the side of the deponent (some of them being on the question of the attachment), excluding the plaintiff, his solicitor, and solicitor's clerk, four only were parishioners, and of those four one was a dissenter. Amongst those who were favourable to the alterations in the church, and to the chair system as opposed to pews, several of whom also said that the proceedings of Mr. Cardinall were supported by dissenters, and were undertaken out of hostility to the incumbent, and from factious motives, were the Rev. Mr. Pemberton, the late curate; Mr. Scott, the sexton; Mr. Bevan, banker; the Rev. Mr. Badham, vicar of All Saints, Sudbury; Mr. Clubb, parish clerk; Mr. Jefferies, the ex-sergeant; Mr. Gager, ratepayer; Mr. Pitcairne, a resident inhabitant; Mr. Westoby, saddler; Mr. Spooner, owner of property in the parish; Mr. Mason, surgeon; the Rev.

Mr. Foster, rector of Foxearth; Mr. Bland, builder and timber merchant; Mr. Green, builder; Mr. Lynch, surgeon; Mr. Making, who assailed Mr. Parmenter's evidence; the Rev. Mr. Gray, a rated inhabitant; and Mr. Digby, an inhabitant. Mr. Scott, the sexton, and a witness named Andrews, ascertained that Mr. Cardinall had not qualified as churchwarden at the last visitation.

At the hearing a point of law was raised as to the plaintiff's right to relief, and as to whether the Attorney-General should not be a party to the suit; but the result was that his Honour Sir John Stuart, V.C., after a most patient hearing of the case, had no doubt about the laudable motives of Mr. Molyneux, but recommended him to proceed more quietly. The order for the injunction was made. At the same time the Vice-Chancellor directed that the plaintiff and the defendants should be at liberty to lay proposals before the judge in chambers, "for fitting up the interior of the parish church, and providing proper accommodation therein for the minister and parishioners of the parish for the performance of Divine Service, but such proposals were to be subject to the approbation of the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese of Ely." On the motion for attachment his Honour thought there had been no deliberate intention to break the injunction; but after remarking on the conflict of evidence as to the time of service, he felt bound to conclude that the notice was served on Grimwood by Mr. Drew at about a quarter past five, and, therefore, adjudged the conduct of the two defendants, Grimwood and Rolfe, to have been improper, and that they were in contempt. He condemned them each to pay £15 towards the cost of the motion, but on their expressing their contrition, made no further order on the motion.

Soon after the plaintiff had obtained this favourable decision, it appears that some apprehension was felt as to the jurisdiction of the court; for on the 26th of May the bill, which prayed for an injunction in the usual manner, was amended by adding to the prayer the words "until a faculty for the purpose has been duly obtained." Meanwhile the course marked out by the order of the 12th of May was pursued. Proposals for fitting up the interior were submitted by both parties to the Bishop of Ely; differing, as may be supposed, in several points, of which the question of the sittings was the most prominent. The plaintiff's proposal was that the pews which had been removed should be replaced. That of the defendant was to provide benches for seating the congregation "as far as the present seating by chairs and benches is insufficient." The only other substantial point of difference was as to the position of the organ. The bishop's reply to the two sets of suggestions was cautious and somewhat enigmatical in one respect, and very decisive in another. It was as follows: "The bishop has no knowledge what kind of pews were in the church before; he suggests for the consideration of the parties whether a better method may be adopted at no greater cost. His lordship will be ready to consider any new plan; and if no better than the old one can be suggested and agreed on, let the old pews be replaced. The bishop has no objection to the north and south sides being benched as at present. The bishop has the strongest objection to chairs." This answer was given in August. Plans were therefore forwarded, and a new set of episcopal observations returned, part of which was as follows: "The bishop considers that the centre of the church should be filled up with single pews according to the plan of pews in modern churches." A reply which still left open the all important issue of what was the plan of pews in modern churches. At the same time the bishop strongly and repeatedly urged the necessity of obtaining a faculty. The papers were all laid before the chief clerk; and the matter stood over to enable Mr. Molyneux to apply for a faculty according to the bishop's directions.

The expense of obtaining a faculty appears in some instances to be very considerable. Mr. Butterfield states that in the course of a large experience in superintending the repairs and alterations of churches, he knows of only a few instances of a faculty; and that it is scarcely ever applied for when the expenses have been met by private contributions and not by a church rate, owing to the expense. From this it appears that a reduction in the fees or an alteration in the procedure, might be attended with pecuniary advantage to the court. Evidently unless some such improvement is made, the diocesan Chancellors must expect to see an important part of their functions in part discharged by a cheaper, and quite as speedy and efficacious a process in Chancery.

Mr. Molyneux's petition was presented to the Chancellor of the diocese of Ely. It set forth that the church of St. Gregory, Sudbury, was in a dilapidated condition and required several alterations, and amongst the works specified was the following:—"In addition to the present accommodation, to complete the seating of the church with benches similar to the best of those now in the church." In other words, the present chairs were to remain. In May the citation issued, and cause was shown at St. Mary's, Cambridge, on the 9th of June last. A previous attempt at arrangement with Mr. Molyneux had failed. Finally, on the day last mentioned, the plaintiff's solicitor having appeared and opposed the granting of the faculty, and Mr. Molyneux refusing to modify his application, the Court refused to decree the faculty, on the ground, as alleged, that Mr. Molyneux did not propose to carry out the refitting of the church in accordance with the bishop's suggestions and approval.

This was a second reverse for the incumbent. The matter now fell of necessity into the hands of the chief clerk, who prepared a scheme, in which the more important question was dealt with in this way:—"The church to be properly floored and fitted up with single pews, according to the plan of pews in modern churches (here following the bishop's language), or with open benches. The question of the general style and character of the pews or benches to be settled in the proceedings requisite for obtaining a faculty." The scheme was certified to have been approved of by the bishop and archdeacon of the diocese, as was admitted by both sides. It was also approved by the judge in chambers; and on the 13th of March last, the injunction was made perpetual, and the costs of the suit were ordered to be paid by the defendants, the Rev. Mr. Molyneux, H. Grimwood, and Rolfe.

It is not necessary for us to attempt to point a moral in this case, or to pronounce commonplaces on the punishment that awaits the unlawful violation of rights of property, undertaken with what laudable motive soever. The argument is more worthy of notice which is implied in the remark of Mr. Butterfield. "The principal object of the defendant was, to provide free accommodation for all the parishioners, in the place of the appropriated pews which before nearly filled the church, and prevented the poorer classes of the parishioners from finding room in the church, and this object was gained by the entire removal of all the pews and the substitution of benches and chairs, such as those now in use at St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey." In other words, if certain London congregations have from choice adopted chairs instead of pews, why should the people of Sudbury complain? But the case seems to show that the people did more than resent the unauthorized destruction of their pews and gallery; they refused to have chairs under any circumstances, and Mr. Butterfield will not deny the essentially different character of the two congregations—one an assembly of strangers, the other of townspeople and neighbours, with all the varied feelings which intimate knowledge of each other and their concerns must necessarily inspire. Without saying whether there ought to be a distinction in the two cases, it is sufficient that the grounds for it are real and existing, and are too substantial at present to give way to any of these doctrines of equality in religious ceremonial and practice which are urged by Mr. Molyneux and his friends. From this we turn to another consideration, namely, that had the Bishop of Ely been favourable to the use of chairs in parish churches, it seems probable that the faculty would not have been refused; and, in that case, the Chief Clerk's scheme would have been different from what it is. The Church party to which Mr. Molyneux and his friends are considered to belong, cannot consistently with their principles view this indirect exercise of episcopal authority with jealousy, though it has been adverse to the innovations of the incumbent of St. Gregory's.

On the whole, looking at the decision in Cardinall v. Molyneux, as an assertion of law and order, of the principle of "fiat justitia," though Mr. Molyneux would doubtless be ready to add the other clause of the proverb, we regard it with entire satisfaction; and in so far as it represents the feelings of the successful public of Sudbury, we think it gives a result, not very flattering possibly to their advance in ecclesiastical taste, but, when the circumstances of the parish are considered consistent, on the whole, with reason and common sense. The suit affords at all events a strong testimony to the superiority of such a tribunal as the Court of Chancery over Diocesan Courts, for the determination of causes like Cardinall v. Molyneux. It would have been impossible to have found in any of the latter a judge of so great authority, learning, and experience, as a Vice-Chancellor. In the present case, indeed, all the parties to the suit, and all the friends of the Church, are under no little obligation to the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, for the signal moderation and regard for the interests of the Church, and for the pains which he took to compose differences, throughout this bitter and troublesome contest.

IX. (Continued.)

As Scotland may, for many legal purposes, be considered as a foreign country, it is as well to observe that it has been held that the statute of limitations runs against a party who had contracted a debt in England by simple contract, and come to Scotland where he remained domiciled. Gibson v. Stewart, Dec. of Court of Sess., vol. 9, p. 525. It has also been held that where money was lent on a bond in the English form, the transaction taking place between parties domiciled in England, and the obligor afterwards gave a heritable bond charging lands in Scotland, the English bond was a mere personal security, and did not merge in the jus nobilitatis. Cust v. Goring, 18 Beav. 383. Lamb v. Lamb, 5 W. R. The priorities of creditors also are regulated by the domicil of the testator, though his personal estate may be situate and administered in another country. Wilson v. Lord Dunsany, 18 Beav. 293.

A most important, as well as interesting part of this subject is with regard to marriages celebrated in a foreign country, and more especially where both the ceremonial and the actual ability of contract are not valid according to our law. Now, in the former case, there can be little doubt, and indeed, I believe, it is admitted, that a marriage contracted according to the lex loci is good, supposing the parties may legally contract such marriage, according to the provisions of our law—the only exception being where such foreign country is a colony appendant to Great Britain, in which case the law of Great Britain would apply not only to the marriage (as affecting the parties to it), but to the actual ceremony. But in the latter, it is now well settled that nothing can make a marriage between British subjects legal, which marriage is not legal according to our law; and although it may be a perfectly good marriage as long as they remain within the pale of those foreign states, (so far, that is, as any question may there arise,) by the laws of which it is declared to be lawful, it becomes bad, or rather the law attaches (for it always was bad by our law) the moment they come within our jurisdiction. As regards Scotland, the law on this subject, as indeed in many others, is, as regards that country, in a very anomalous state. The Act 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 54, which has made the marriage with a deceased wife's sister void, does not extend to Scotland; and indeed, it was quite unnecessary that it should, inasmuch as such marriage, though the ceremony may take place unquestioned, is penally recognised when once contracted, and punished accordingly, very much in the same way as bigamy in England; the marriage, so far as the relative position of the parties goes in consanguinity, is good; but the man by reason of a previous act, the consequences of which are still subsisting consequences, is disabled from contracting it, that is, he renders himself penally liable if he does so. So that a man domiciled in England may marry his deceased wife's sister in Scotland; but the moment he is indicted under the Scotch law, plead that it is no marriage. This subject, however, is fully discussed in a case of Brook v. Brook, of which I insert an extract from a report in the Weekly Reporter, 6 vol. p. 110. This case came before the Vice-Chancellor Stuart and Mr. Justice Cresswell, and was argued in March, November and December, 1857, and the following were the facts:—B. by his first wife C. who died in 1841, had one son and one daughter. In 1851, he being then a domiciled English subject intermarried in Denmark with E. the sister of his deceased wife (such marriage being valid according to the lex loci contractus) by whom he had one son and two daughters. By his will, dated in 1855, he gave all his real and personal estate among the children of both marriages in certain proportions. The testator B. and his second wife E. died in 1855, and the son of their marriage in 1857. The question then arose whether the share of this son in B.'s estate went, as to the realty to B.'s son by the first marriage, and as to the personalty to all B.'s children equally, or whether such share, both as to realty and personalty, passed to the Crown by reason of the invalidity of B.'s second marriage in this country, and consequent illegitimacy of the issue.

Upon the effect of a foreign contract the following authorities were referred to:—Buller v. Freeman, 1 Amb. 301; Compton v. Bearcroft, cited 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 443; and "Buller's Nisi Prius," 6th ed. 113; Fenton v. Livingston, 18 Fraser; and "Story's Confli. of Laws," ss. 66a, 97, 98, 112, 123, & 123a. The writer last mentioned showed that such marriages as the present, if valid in the country where celebrated, must be equally so in all other countries by the comity of nations. Sir F. Kelly also cited Ruding v. Smith, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 371; Thompson v. The Advocate-General, 13 Sim. 153; s. c. 12 Cl. & F. 1; Roach v. Garvan, 1 Ves. sen. 157; Middleton v. Janverin, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 437; and "Story's Confli. of Laws," s. 124.

On the other hand, the 26 Geo. 2, c. 33, for the better prevention of clandestine marriages, was for a century evaded, by parties intending to marry going to Scotland or abroad. Two years after the passing of that Act Lord Hardwicke held, although the words of that enactment were stronger than those of 5 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 54, that it did not affect the marriage of British subjects in foreign countries. This distinction was very strongly remarked upon by Lord Brougham, in 11 Cl. & Fin. 150-1. The following authorities were also referred to:—"Story's Conflict of Laws," 115; Medway v. Needham, 16 Massachusetts Reports, 157; Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 58; Herbert v. Herbert, ib. 263; 3 Phill. Eccl. Huber (lib. 1, tit. 3, "De Conflictu Legum," s. 2, 538) on the comity of nations as applicable to this subject has this passage:—"That the rulers of every empire from comity admit that the laws of every people in force within its own limits ought to have the same force everywhere so far as they do not prejudice the powers or rights of other governments or of their citizens." By the comity of nations, a foreign country is bound to take the rule of our own law on this subject as applicable to our own domiciled subjects. Rose v. Rose, 4 Wils. & Shaw. 289; Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 423; Scrimshire v. Scrimshire, ib. 407. McCarthy v. Decaix, 2 Rus. & Myl. 614; Sherwood v. Ray, 1 P. C. C. 353, 396; Forbes v. Cochrane, 2 Bar. & Cress. 448, 470; Ray v. Sherwood, 1 Curt. Eccl. Rep. 173, 193. Saint Joseph, 2 Concordance entre les Codes Civils Etrangers, 139. In Male v. Roberts, 3 Esp. 163, Lord Eldon held that the law of the country where the contract arose must govern the contract. In that case the cause of action accrued in Scotland, and infancy was pleaded, and it was decided that the defendant must show that infancy was a legal defence to the demand by proving the law of Scotland in that respect. So also, in De la Vega v. Vianna, 1 B. & Ad. 284, which was a suit between parties resident in England on a contract made between them in a foreign country, it was held that the contract must be interpreted according to the foreign law. Stuart, V.C., (Nov. 25), said that the case was by far too important to be dealt with except upon mature consideration. On the 4th December, Cresswell, J., delivered his opinion upon the case stating the facts, and observing upon the various authorities and arguments adduced: his lordship observed that Sir George Hay, in pronouncing judgment in Harford v. Morris, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 423, expressed an opinion that marriages of English subjects having an English domicile celebrated in other countries have been held valid—not merely because they would be valid according to the laws of those countries, but because they were not contrary to the law of England. In p. 434 he says, "I do not say that foreign laws cannot be received in this court in cases where the court of that country had a jurisdiction, or that this court would not determine upon those laws in such a case. But I deny the lex loci universally to be a foundation for the jurisdiction, so as to impose an obligation on the Court to determine by those foreign laws." The judgment in that case was reversed, but upon grounds wholly irrespective of the opinion above cited. It therefore remains of such value as the reputation of the learned judge by whom it was pronounced can give to it. And in Warrender v. Warrender 2 Cl. & Fin. 488, 530, there are some passages in the judgment delivered by Lord Brougham which throw much light on this question. In one place he says, "The general principle is denied by no one that the lex loci is to be the governing rule in deciding upon the validity or invalidity of all personal contracts. But the rule extends, I apprehend, no further than to the ascertaining of the validity of the contract, and the meaning of the parties; that is, the existence of the contract, and its construction." The case of Reg. v. Lolley (ubi supra), although not directly in point, almost compels one (if it be good law) to adopt that opinion. The case was this:—An Englishman married in England. He afterwards went to Scotland, and obtained a divorce there, which according to the law of that country dissolved the marriage. He then returned to England, and married another woman, leaving the first wife, for which he was indicted, tried, and convicted. The propriety of that conviction was argued by very able counsel before the twelve judges, and, by their unanimous opinion, was held to be correct. The learned judge then went on to say, "There are some passages in 'Huber's Prelectiones Juris Civilis' which show that, in his opinion, the comitas gentium did not require so large an effect to be given to foreign law. In his chapter 'De Conflictu Legum' he states, in s. 2, three axioms:—1. Leges cujusque imperii vim habent intra terminos ejusdem reipublice, omnesque ei subjectos obligant, nec ultra. 2. Pro subjectis imperio habendi sunt omnes qui intra terminos ejusdem reperiuntur, sive in perpetuum sive ad tempus ibi commorentur. 3. Rectores imperiorum id comiter agunt ut jura cujusque populi intra terminos ejus exercita, teneant ubique suam vim quatenus nihil potestati aut juri alterius imperantis ejusque civium prejudicetur. There is nothing in the case of Roach v. Garvan, Ves. sen. 157, to show that if the parties had been British subjects domiciled in England, and it had been contrary to our law, and the courts of this country had been called upon to adjudicate with regard to it, they would have held it valid. The next case in order of time was Scrimshire v. Scrimshire, 2 Hagg. Cons. Rep. 395." In a subsequent part of the judgment he continued, "I have found nothing to justify giving the more extensive meaning of the words of Lord Stowell except some passages in Mr. Justice Story's work on the 'Conflict of Laws,' and a decision cited by him from the reports of the Court of Massachusetts; and perhaps this greater force given in one of the United States to the laws of another at variance with its own may be accounted for by the greater inclination that would naturally exist to give a larger scope to the comitas gentium between the different states of the Union than could be expected to find place amongst nations wholly independent of, and unconnected with, each other. I have therefore come to the conclusion that a marriage contracted by the subjects of a country in which they are domiciled in another country is not to be held valid if by contracting it the laws of their own country are violated." Vice-Chancellor Stuart subsequently delivered judgment, in which he concurred substantially with the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Cresswell.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The sittings of the Central Criminal Court for the April session were resumed on the 8th inst. before the Right Hon. W. Cubitt, M.P., Lord Mayor of the city of London; Mr. Russell Gurney, Q.C., the Recorder; Aldermen Challis, Sir F. G. Moon, Hale, Allen, and Dakin, Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Abbiss, Mr. Sheriff Lusk, Mr. Under-Sheriff Eagleton, Mr. Under-Sheriff Gammon, &c.

Mr. Herbert Arrott Browning has been appointed to a clerkship in the Duchy of Lancaster.

The office of resident assistant commissioner of the copyhold enclosure commission has become vacant by the death of Colonel Robert K. Dawson, C.B.

The recordership of Leeds has become vacant by the death of Mr. Thomas Flower Ellis, barrister-at-law, who died at his residence in London on the 5th instant. The Attorney-Generalship of the Duchy of Lancaster has also become vacant by the same sad event.

It is stated that Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., has resigned the recordership of Brighton. The salary is £200 per annum.

Parliament and Legislation.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, April 9.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

In the absence of the Earl of Shaftesbury the committee on this Bill was postponed.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

This Bill having been read a first time,

The Earl of DENBY thought it would be advisable to refer the Bill to a select committee, as a Bill of so complicated a character could be better considered by a committee composed of noble lords who took an interest in legal and mercantile subjects, than by a committee composed of the entire of their Lordships' house.

The LORD CHANCELLOR opposed referring the Bill to a select committee, as he had every reason to believe it would receive a full and satisfactory consideration without the intervention of a select committee.

Tuesday next was then fixed for the second reading.

Thursday, April 11.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Lord REDESDALE moved the following resolutions:—

* That no private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a second time after Tuesday, the 9th day of July next;

"That, no Bill confirming any provisional order of the Board of Health, or authorizing any enclosure of lands under special report of the enclosure commissioners for England and Wales, or for confirming any scheme of the charity commissioners for England and Wales, shall be read a second time after Tuesday, the 9th day of July next;

"That when a Bill shall have passed this House with amendments, these orders shall not apply to any new Bill sent up from the House of Commons which the chairman of committees shall report to the House is substantially the same as the Bill so amended."

The resolutions were agreed to.

Lord REDESDALE said the House having agreed to these resolutions, he wished to state that he would not give notice of any similar resolution regarding public Bills. He had come to this conclusion, not because he had changed his opinion on the subject, but because he thought it better to see what recommendations would be made by the committees of both Houses now sitting on the public business. The resolution came to formerly on this subject had been disapproved by several members; but he could show a precedent for it in the proceedings of their lordships' House as far back as 1668.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 8.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

On the motion that this Bill be read a third time,

Mr. VANCE said that there was still a strong objection to that provision of the Bill which took away nearly altogether the power of supervision from the official assignee. He hoped that the provision in the Bill, in respect to the new act of bankruptcy created by persons suffering execution to be levied on their property, would be altered; for it took away all the reward to which a man might be entitled for diligence in proceeding against his debtor.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

Wednesday, April 10.

NEW SITE FOR LAW COURTS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL gave notice that on Thursday, the 18th inst., he should move for leave to bring in a Bill or Bills to provide for the concentration in one place of all the superior courts of law and equity, including the Courts of Admiralty, Probate, Divorce, and Bankruptcy, and the offices connected with them, and for the application of certain funds of the Court of Chancery for the purchase of the site of such courts and offices, and for the erection thereof.

Thursday, April 11.

NEW WRIT.

On the motion of Mr. BRAND, a new writ was ordered for the borough of Marylebone, in the room of Mr. Edwin James, who since his election has accepted the office of steward of the manor of Northstead.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.

The Admiralty Court Jurisdiction Bill [Lords] passed through committee.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT (1854).

Mr. LOCKE obtained leave to bring in a Bill to extend the Common Law Procedure Act (1854); and the Bill was read the first time.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

VOLUNTEERS.

A BILL TO EXEMPT THE VOLUNTEER FORCES OF GREAT BRITAIN FROM THE PAYMENT OF TOLLS.

1. From and after the passing of this Act all volunteer officers and soldiers being in uniform shall be exempted from payment of any dues, duties, pontage, or tolls on embarking or disembarking from or upon any pier, wharf, quay, or landing place, or in passing over or along any turnpike or other roads or bridges, any Act or Acts to the contrary notwithstanding.

2. No toll or pontage shall be demanded or taken at any turnpike gate or bar or at any bridge for any horse, mare, gelding, carriage, waggon, cart, or car ridden by, drawing, or conveying any volunteer officer or soldier who shall at the time be wearing uniform, or conveying any baggage belonging to any volunteer officer or soldier, anything in any Act or Acts to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. Any toll collector or other person who shall take, demand, or receive any toll whatsoever from any volunteer officer or soldier, being in uniform, either for himself or for any horse, mare, gelding, carriage, waggon, cart, or car on or in which he may be riding, or which may be conveying any baggage belonging to any volunteer officer or soldier, shall, on conviction by any justice of the peace, forfeit and pay for every offence a sum not exceeding five pounds nor less than twenty shillings.

4. Any person who shall falsely personate or represent himself to be a volunteer officer or soldier with the view fraudulently of evading any toll to which he would otherwise be liable, shall, on conviction by any justice of the peace, forfeit and pay for every offence a sum not exceeding five pounds nor less than twenty shillings.

PUBLIC CHARITIES.

A BILL TO FACILITATE THE APPOINTMENT OF NEW TRUSTEES IN PUBLIC CHARITIES.

1. Provides that the Act shall apply to all public charities (not incorporated) in England and Wales.

2. Where any vacancy in the number of trustees in whom any property may be vested, shall have happened, and persons duly qualified to fill such vacancy shall have been elected a certificate of such election, and that it was legally made according to the form or to the effect mentioned in Schedule A of the Act signed by the chairman for the time being of the meeting at which such election shall be made, and attested by two witnesses, together with a solemn declaration made by such chairman as aforesaid, in pursuance of the fifth and sixth of King William the Fourth, and according to the form or to the effect contained in Schedule B. of the Act may, within three calendar months after such election shall have been made, be presented to the judge of the county court of the district wherein such charity is situate; and within one calendar month after the receipt of such certificate of election and declaration the said judge shall issue a certificate of confirmation under his hand and the seal of his court, according to the form contained in Schedule C. of the Act, and such certificate of confirmation, with such certificate of election and declaration thereto annexed, shall be registered in the office for the general registration of the judgments of county courts, and on such registration such certificate of confirmation shall, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be received as conclusive evidence of such certificate of confirmation having been signed by the said judge, and sealed with the seal of the said court, and of its having been registered as aforesaid, and of the truth of all the facts, matters, and things contained in such certificates of confirmation and election and declaration, and of the provisions of this Act having been duly complied with.

3. On the registration of such certificate of confirmation, with such certificate of election and declaration thereto annexed, all property vested in trustees in trust for such charity shall vest in the trustees named in such certificate of election and declaration: provided that no copyhold or customary lands holden in trust for such charity shall vest in such trustees until the consent in writing of the lord or lady of the manor whereof such lands shall be holden shall have been entered on the court rolls of such manor, together with a memorandum of such certificate of confirmation as aforesaid.

4. Where any trustees of any public charity in whom any property is vested in trust for such charity shall be desirous of retiring from such office of trustee, or for the space of twelve consecutive calendar months shall have been absent from the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in either of such cases a vacancy shall be deemed to have happened in the number of the trustees of such charity, and it shall be lawful for the person or persons duly authorized to fill up any vacancy to elect or appoint a trustee or trustees in the place of such retiring or absent trustee.

5. Provides for the payment of the fees and states the effect of the registrar's certificate.

REAL PROPERTY AND CONVEYANCING.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE POSTPONED TO UNDISCLOSED PRIOR TRUST.

Stackhouse v. The Countess of Jersey, V. C. W., 9 W. R. 453.

The danger of taking an equitable mortgage, where the property mortgaged may be subject to an undisclosed trust, has been illustrated by several cases; but it seems that the convenience of the practice is thought to counteract its insecurity, and bankers persevere in lending money upon deeds with almost as much confidence as upon bullion. A remarkable example of the danger of this practice was furnished by the case of Manningford v. Toleman (1 Coll. 670), in which a very curious state of circumstances came before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. There had been a marriage of a lady whose fortune was under the control of the Court, and the arrangements which enabled the husband to commit a fraud were made with the sanction of the Master. A sum of £2,000 was paid to the husband out of Court, upon his undertaking to apply it in the purchase of a suitable house for himself and wife, which he was to convey to the trustees of his marriage settlement upon certain trusts. He purchased a house accordingly, and having procured it to be conveyed to himself in fee, he deposited the title-deeds with his bankers, as a security for advances, without notice to the bankers of the trusts of the settlement. It was held that the trusts must prevail against the bankers' lien. Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce said he thought that at the moment of the purchase a trust was fastened upon the property. "Consistently with all the authoritative decisions since the Statute of Frauds, the estate was bound by the trust. The husband was as completely a trustee of it as if he had executed a declaration of trust, not conveying the legal estate. The trustee thus holding the trust property pledged it for a debt of his own. According to the principles of this Court, and the course of decisions, the prior trust must prevail." The bill had been brought by the bank to establish its lien, and the Vice-Chancellor asked the plaintiffs' counsel whether they were willing to give up the deeds, and upon their agreeing so to do, the bill was dismissed without costs. It is to be observed that the Court did not go into the question whether the bank had notice, but decided against it on the assumption that it had none. It would seem, however, that, supposing the bank to be innocent, the Court would not have taken the deeds away from it, although it would not have been allowed to make any beneficial use of them. The trustees, who had got the legal estate by conveyance from the husband, would probably have been left to recover them by an action.

The lesson which the above case ought to have inculcated on bankers has been renewed in a very striking manner by the recent case which has suggested this article. That case arose out of a fraud perpetrated by the too well known solicitor John Edward Buller. The plaintiff, Mrs. Stackhouse, and her sister, who was Buller's wife, became entitled, on the death of their mother, to £1,000 each. Both sums were received by Buller, and on Dec. 3, 1849, were advanced by him in one sum on mortgage in his own name. In July, 1851, Mrs. Stackhouse was for the first time informed, by a letter from Buller, that her money had been thus employed. Interest was paid to her, and upon her marriage, in January, 1856, Buller paid to her £100, and executed a declaration of trust of the remaining £900. The trustees of her marriage settlement frequently applied to Buller for the deeds relating to the mortgage, but were from time to time put off with promises. They applied to the mortgagor, who told them that he continued to pay interest to Buller, and had received no notice of any charge. Buller absconded and was declared bankrupt, and the plaintiffs then discovered that he had in March, 1854, deposited the mortgage deed at Child's bank as security for advances to him. Mrs. Stackhouse and her trustees had filed this bill to establish their right to the £900, in priority to any claim by the defendants. Messrs. Child, as equitable mortgagees. The substantial question between the parties could not, after Manningford v. Toleman, and other cases, be open to any serious doubt. Vice-Chancellor Wood said that Buller by his letter of July, 1851, had clearly recognized the trust. Unless there was such negligence as to deprive the plaintiffs of their right to the money secured by the deed, the deposit of that deed by the trustee gave no interest whatever to the bankers. This decision proceeded on the plain principle that a person could not pass that which was not his own. There had been no negligence. Buller was entitled in right of his wife to half of the money secured by the deed, and, therefore, it was not easy to say how he could have been compelled to deliver up the deed except by removing him from the trust. The application to the mortgagor did not elicit anything calculated to excite suspicion. If, therefore, this had been merely a question as to a fund in medio, the case would have been of the simplest character. Between two innocent parties, each having merely an equitable title, priority in time must decide the right. Messrs. Child would, therefore, lose their money, although the transaction was as prudent and business-like on their part as any transaction of the kind could be. We can only say that it is wonderful that such transactions should take place every day in the face of decisions which declare the risks in which they are involved. But although the principle which governed the case was so very clear, the Vice-Chancellor felt a good deal of difficulty from the frame of the suit and what had taken place since it was instituted. The suit was simply against the bankers, and the mortgagor was not a party to it. It asked for a declaration that the bankers were not entitled to an equitable charge on the mortgage debt of £2,000 for more than the £1,000, which belonged to Buller, and that the £900 belonged to the plaintiffs, for whom the defendants were in the nature of trustees. Now, if the suit had remained in this shape, the question would have arisen whether, unless the Court was prepared to disregard the decision of Sir Edward Sugden in Joyce v. De Moleyns, 2 Jo. & Lat. 374, the defendants were not entitled to have the bill dismissed on the ground that they were purchasers for value without notice of the plaintiffs' right. In order to understand the difficulty which thus arose it will be necessary to ascertain what Sir Edward Sugden's decision was.

In Joyce v. De Moleyns, a testator who died before the new Wills Act, devised all his right and interest in certain tithes to his second son W. At the time of making his will the testator was entitled to an equitable estate in fee simple in the tithes. The legal estate in fee was afterwards conveyed to him. Upon his decease administration with the will annexed was granted to his eldest son and heir-at-law, F., who obtained possession of the deed of conveyance of the legal estate in the tithes and deposited it with certain bankers by way of equitable mortgage. This deposit was made without the knowledge of W., who from the decease of the testator had been in possession of the tithes, and had frequently applied to F. for the deed, but could not obtain it. The bill was filed by a bond creditor of the testator for administration of his estate, and it prayed that the bankers might be decreed to deliver up the deed. The bankers by their answer insisted that they were purchasers for valuable consideration without notice of the will of the testator, or of the title of any person claiming thereunder, or of the demand of the plaintiff. Lord Chancellor Sugden said it was clear that the persons entitled to the tithes might maintain trover for the deeds. There was no question as to their title to recover at law; but his Lordship apprehended that the defence of a purchase for value without notice was a shield as well against a legal as an equitable title. "I think," said he, "that the mere circumstance that this is a legal right is not a bar to the defence set up, if in other respects it is a good defence. That it is a good defence cannot be denied. Suppose a tenant for life under a will with remainder over, and that the tenant for life, being the heir-at-law of the testator, conveys the inheritance to a purchaser without notice, the remainder-man cannot have any relief in equity against the purchaser. He must establish his title outside of this Court as well as he can. It is the same with respect to title-deeds. Deeds are chattels; and, where no adverse claimant interferes, the person entitled to the estate is entitled to the deeds. But the person who has possession of the deeds may deal with them as with any other chattels, subject to the rights of those who are interested in them. Here a person obtains the possession of title-deeds, having no title to the estate. Another person advances money to him upon the security of a deposit of the deeds. The rule, therefore, comes into operation (for it applies equally to real estate and to chattels) that if a man advance money, bonâ fide and without notice of the infirmity of the title of the seller, he will be protected in this Court, and the parties having title must seek relief elsewhere. . . . The defendants use the possession of the deeds, as they have a right to do, as a shield to protect them against the plaintiff. They can make no use of the deeds themselves; they cannot maintain possession of them against the true owner. But in this Court they have a right to say that they ought not to be compelled to deliver them up, as they obtained them bonâ fide, and without notice." The bill was dismissed as against the bankers with costs. The soundness of the above decision appears to be questioned in two respects. 1st, Lord Cottenham says in Fraser v. Jones, 17 L. J. N. S. Ch. 353, that it is the only instance in which a party claiming only an equitable interest has been held entitled to protect himself on the ground of being a purchaser without notice. 2nd, Vice-Chancellor Wood suggested, in the case we are now discussing, that the plaintiff in Jones v. De Moleyns may have been entitled to a declaration of right, although he may not have been entitled to compel the defendants to deliver up the deeds. He thought, that in the case before him, either the mortgagor might have filed a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader, and the fund being thus brought in medio, the question must have been decided in the plaintiffs' favour; or the plaintiffs might have filed their bill against the mortgagor and the bankers to have a declaration of their right in the presence of the mortgagor to this money. If Joyce v. De Moleyns was an authority against the plaintiffs' right to such a declaration, his Honour was not disposed to follow it.

This is how matters stood upon the bill as originally framed. Pending the suit, however, the mortgagor being desirous of paying off the mortgage, leave was obtained for him to pay the money into court. If hereupon the bill had been simply amended and had asked for the decision of the Court upon the fund thus brought in medio, payment would have been directed to the plaintiffs as having the better right. But the amended bill stated that the defendants had by arrangement delivered the deeds to the mortgagor, and the £900 had been paid into court "without prejudice to the question originally raised in this suit." The defendants relied on these words as entitling them to the benefit of whatever argument they might have founded on the actual possession of the deeds, and the Vice-Chancellor seems to have felt it his duty to look at the case as it had stood upon the original bill. The substance of his decision appears to be, that in some way or other the plaintiffs could have got the relief they sought, and, therefore, he gave it on the present bill; but, in consideration of the doubts as to the frame of that bill, he did not give costs.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF EVIDENCE—EFFECT OF ADMISSIONS.

Haller v. Worman, 9 C. P., W. R. 348. Tupper v. Foulkes, ib., 349.

These are two cases upon the law of evidence, as affected by admissions, and therefore, though otherwise unconnected, they shall be considered together.

The general doctrine with respect to "admissions" is that they are received as evidence in substitution for the ordinary and legal proof (see Taylor, 2nd ed. s. 653); and one class of such substituted proof are statements relevant to the issues which have been made by the legal advisers of the parties to the record. If an admission be expressly made by the attorney of one of them, for the purpose of alleviating the stringency of some rule of practice, or of dispensing with the formal proof of some fact at the trial (as in the case of documents admitted in consequence of a "notice to admit"), it binds the client conclusively throughout the cause; and even where not made with such object, but as it were incidentally, such statement is often considered as raising an inference respecting the existence of facts which the opposite party would otherwise have been called upon to prove (see, for example, Milward v. Temple, 1 Camp. 375). On the other hand, admissions by an attorney respecting his client in a mere conversation cannot be received, as his agency is only for the management of the cause in court (see Petch v. Lyon, 9 Q. B. 147). Such being the rules with regard to admissions by the party's attorney, those made by his counsel stand on much the same footing: for where a special case is signed by the junior counsel on both sides, the facts therein are regarded as admitted for the purpose of any ulterior proceedings (Van Wart v. Wolley, R. & M. 4); and when the counsel on both sides so conduct a cause as to lead to an inference that a certain fact is admitted between them, it will thereafter be taken as true (Stracy v. Blake, 1 M. & W. 168). Indeed, in one case where the plaintiff's counsel stated in his opening that his client had paid a particular cheque, the defendant was allowed to give secondary evidence of its contents (after a notice to produce) without proving in any other way that it was in the possession of the plaintiff. This was the case of Duncombe v. Daniell (8 C. & P. 222); but on the other hand in Colledge v. Horn (3 Bing. 119), it was said to be a question of much doubt whether the defendant (a new trial having been ordered) might dispense with proof of part of his case on the ground that the plaintiff's counsel had in the former trial admitted it in his opening address while in the presence of his client. With regard to the case of Colledge v. Horn (the decision itself in which was not in reference to the point now under consideration), it may be here remarked that one of the judges, Mr. Justice Burrough, stated incidentally his opinion to be that if a plaintiff was in court and heard what his counsel said and made no objection, he was thereafter bound by the statement. And Mr. Taylor, in his work upon Evidence (s. 709), observes, commenting on this dictum, that if Mr. Justice Burrough's view is the correct one, "some learned members of the profession, if duly watched, will often save their adversaries much trouble in the way of proof." Now, the first of the two cases above referred to, viz., Haller v. Worman (which was an action to recover some deeds in which the defendant had pleaded, inter alia, non detinet), justifies this remark. For the defendant's counsel having, in support of a summons to change the venue, admitted, in the presence of the clerk of the defendant's attorney, that his client had the deeds in question, and claimed a lien thereon, this admission was received by the judge at the trial in support of the plaintiff's side of the issue joined; and the Court, supporting this ruling, observed that the statement made, was one made by counsel in the discharge of his duty in order to influence the judge in favour of his client, and that it was equally a statement of the attorney represented by his clerk; for that if the statement made by counsel were incorrect, it was the attorney's duty to set it right at the time.

As to the second case, Tupper v. Foulkes, it may be thought somewhat to impugn the accuracy of another passage in Mr. Taylor's work that, viz., wherein he states (s. 907) as a general proposition, subject to no exception, that in order to authorize an agent to execute a deed for his principal the authority must be given by an instrument under seal; and that when he has not been authorized in that manner, a parol ratification by the principal of the deed will not give it validity. In the present case, the defendant was sued on a deed of indemnity, and he pleaded, inter alia, non est factum. It appeared that the defendant's son had executed the deed in his father's name; and that the defendant, on being subsequently brought into the room, and asked if his son had his authority to execute the deed for him, said that he had. It was objected at the trial that it must be shown that the son was authorized by deed; but the judge held that the defendant was bound by his admission that his son had proper authority. Now, this decision appears at first sight to be at variance with the proposition with which Mr. Taylor concludes in the passage above adverted to; for he there says, "and it seems that evidence of the implied, if not of the express recognition or adoption of the deed by the principal, will not, even as against him, raise a presumption that the agent was thus formally authorized to act, so as to dispense with the necessity for proving that fact;" for which he cites Lord Gosford v. Robb (8 Ir. Law Rep. 217).

But it is to be remarked that in the first place Mr. Taylor only says "it seems," and secondly, that the present action was against the principal himself, and not against other parties affected by the instrument, with regard to whom the law may probably be as Mr. Taylor supposes. And this is the more likely when the grounds for the present decision are considered. For the argument seems to have turned upon a point overlooked by Mr. Taylor—viz., that as against the principal there would be an estoppel from afterwards denying the proper authority to have been given, arising from his admission at the time (see Doe d. Birmingham Canal Co. v. Bold, 11 Q. B. 127). Moreover, in the present case, there was an act by the defendant which went beyond a mere "recognition or adoption" of the instrument. There was an actual re-delivery; for it is laid down in the books that if a deed already executed be lying on a table, and I say, "take that as my deed," it is sufficient without taking it into my hands—for "not only may a deed be delivered by deeds without words, but also by words without deeds" (see Shep. Touch. p. 37).

EXAMINATION OF ARTICLED CLERKS.

I feel bound to testify my gratitude to you for your article on this subject, published in your number of March 30th. I am quite satisfied you understood my letter, inserted in the same number of your Journal, in a very different spirit from that exhibited by your flippant correspondent of this week; whom I may tell that if my education has taught me nothing else it has taught me to be courteous and civil to others, though strangers and unknown—a habit it is evident this young Nemesis has yet to acquire. It is not usual, I believe, in polite society to tell a gentleman what position in life you think he is fit for, or if two differ in opinion, for one to tell the other he is absurd; the first would, I apprehend, be considered gratuitously impertinent, and the other an expletive notorious for anything than its elegance. But I am not inclined to be so severe upon inexperience, and therefore pass on to the object of my letter.

I have not been able to procure through my bookseller "Brown's Smaller Work on Mental Physiology," and "Adam Smith's Ethical Histories," two of the works recommended in your article for perusal. You will therefore increase my obligation to you by a line in your next week's paper informing me where they may be procured.

My only apology for thus troubling you must be the interest you exhibit on behalf of artied clerks, and my inability to obtain the books through the usual channel.

AN ARTICLED CLERK.

[Sir James Mackintosh wrote a history of Ethics, which has been edited by Dr. Whewell. Adam Smith's history of Moral Systems is part of his larger work on the Theory of Moral Sentiments. The Historical Survey of Speculative Philosophy of Chalybæus (Tulk's translation) is the best work of the kind on Metaphysics. Our publisher, we have no doubt, will procure any of these books for subscribers.—ED. & J.]

LEGAL EDUCATION.

My letter in your impression of the 30th ult. has been replied to (on the 6th inst.) by another "Artied Clerk." He first taxes me with mistaking the whole matter. Now I appeal to anyone if I pretended to understand the report of the committee of the Law Society? But if I did fancy I interpreted it rightly, I have erred in good company. Look at the letters in your columns of "An Artied Clerk," on the 30th ult., "W.

P. B.," and "B." on the 23rd ult., "A. B." on the 9th, besides, I believe, every other writer but "An Artied Clerk," and your leading article of the 30th ult., where you say, "it is at present proposed that every candidate must pass in Latin, and either Greek, French, German, mathematics, or physics" (whatever the latter may mean). Another "Artied Clerk" says, in the face of this, that "probably a second perusal of the report will convince" me "that neither Greek nor German are absolutely necessary requirements, and they will only be expected from those candidates who fail in other and less difficult subjects." My words were, "it seems to me that a great many persons duly qualified will be deterred from offering themselves." I went on to say that, as I understood the report, Xenophon and Schiller seemed essential, and I so repeat; for the class on whose behalf I write cannot possibly possess much, if any, knowledge of Latin, French, and the other two, and will consider that they must cram in the other languages referred to, to cover their deficiencies in these. But, as I said before, I did not pretend to understand the report; and the main fact is, as well stated by "B.," "If we are to have such absurdity as a classical education, surely it ought to be reduced to a minimum." That the council of the Law Institution represent the views of the profession generally is a fallacy; that they do in this particular respect, I question. "B." says truly, "Are we (the solicitors) to have no artied clerks at all in future?" That is really the question. Premiums are now almost unheard of, salaries often required; but what clerk paying no premium, or wanting a salary, can pass this examination? Clearly, not one. All your correspondents agree in this respect. You say in your article before referred to, many "of your correspondents who desire to avail themselves of the ten years clause may" "find it extremely difficult to pass such an examination as would be very proper for lads who have just left school;" and yet that is what the committee actually propose!

X. Y. Z.

Writing as I do on the weak side and representing those who do not put themselves forward to be heard against the feeling of the dons of their profession, I claim pardon if I express myself too forcibly. Numbers are against us; the Legislature and the Law Institution are too strong for us; the pretended and would-be organ of the country solicitors will not let us be heard; and it is in your columns alone we can get even an audience. Encouraged in seemingly so hopeless a conflict by various admirable passages in an article recently appearing in your columns, I beg to represent the case of the hardworking clerk, who has not had the benefit of a classical education, or at all events not of one that will enable him to pass the school-boy examination which the Law Society threaten. I also plead the cause of the great body of the profession—their masters. The large Lincoln's-inn houses, represented too strongly in the council, are not likely to give clerks their articles—800 or even 500 guineas come in to swell their ample balances at their bankers, and the efforts of a hardworking managing or copying clerk, or their struggling master having their bread to earn, are alike unknown and uncared for. Is the law in future to become merely an aristocratic profession? What men are expected to practise in the county and insolvency courts? What highly educated solicitor to attend to the common law judges chambers, or are none but paid clerks to go there? In plain English it is well known that a solicitor expects to live by his business; yet the Law Society coolly ignore that fact by preventing meritorious clerks from being artied, and thus entertaining an honourable ambition, or really working solicitors, from getting clerks at a remunerative salary, merely as far as I can learn, because various unqualified and disreputable practitioners have crept into the profession. But who certified that those men had duly served? Do not the Law Society regard but as the inerest form that very important certificate? Why should all but the dons of the profession suffer because a laxity has grown up in permitting improper additions to their body, and for the sins of a past generation?

LONDON COMMISSIONERS TO ADMINISTER OATHS IN COMMON LAW.

I cannot understand nor ascertain upon what principle these commissioners are appointed, and I therefore write to you in the hope that you, or some of your numerous readers, will enlighten me upon the subject.

I was admitted in Easter Term, 1850, and have taken out my certificate ever since. Finding it was necessary, and that it would be a great convenience to myself, my neighbours, and clients, that I should be a London commissioner, I, sometime after having been ten years in practice, presented the usual petition, setting out various special reasons why I should be appointed, and the usual certificate, numerously and respectably signed by barristers and solicitors of standing, and also gave the usual notice to the Incorporated Law Society of my intention to apply. I believe many other solicitors did the same about the same time, understanding (as I did) that a "batch" of London commissioners was about to be appointed.

On my application in due course to the Lord Chief Justice's clerk, I was informed that I and many others were not to be appointed commissioners, the preference having been given to those who had been longer in practice than we had, say thirty, twenty, or fifteen years instead of ten.

Now, observing the appointment of a London commissioner in your paper of April 6, (who is personally unknown to me) I had the curiosity to turn to the "Law List," where I find that he was not admitted until Michaelmas Term, 1853, not yet eight years. Now, sir, I ask how is this? Is the "Law List" correct, or has the gentleman some friends at court, or by whom is this appointment made before the gentleman has been ten years in practice, as is, I believe, required by the Act; or, if not required by the Act, why in preference to us who have been eleven years in practice? This surely requires an explanation, and I hope some one will give it.

MARK LANK.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL— MEETING AT MANCHESTER.

A conference on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill was held at the Palatine Hotel, Manchester, on the 22nd of March last, at which the following Associations and Chambers of commerce were represented:—Manchester Association for the Protection of Trade; Manchester Guardian Society; Leeds Chamber of Commerce; Bradford Chamber of Commerce; Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce. We have been requested to publish the minutes of what transpired at this meeting, and as the subject of the Attorney-General's Bill is still of considerable interest to the profession, we do so at some length. The following gentlemen were present:—Philip Gillibrand, Esq., President of the Manchester Association for the Protection of Trade; William Butterfield, Esq., President of the Manchester Guardian Society; John Jowitt, Esq., Vice-President of the Leeds Chamber of Commerce; J. Darlington, Esq., Secretary of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce; William Willans, Esq., President of the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce; Thomas Mallinson, Esq., ex-president; Mr. Edward Huth, Vice-President; also, Messrs. Francis Taylor, Charles Watson, George Booth, R. M. Shipman, Hugh Fleming, Henry Whitworth, Joseph Rayner, S. Gelder, and John Dodds.—Phillip Gillibrand, Esq., in the chair.—The chairman briefly explained the proceedings which had been taken by the Manchester Association in reference to this Bill, and the circumstances which had led the committee of that association to invite the co-operation of other commercial bodies in promoting amendments in the Bill when it reaches the House of Lords. The attention of the meeting was first directed to the following resolution, proposed by the Attorney-General as the basis of an alteration in clause 201 of the Bill:—"That, in addition to the ordinary stamp duty, there shall be charged an ad valorem stamp duty of seven shillings upon every £100 of property comprised in every trust or other deed or instrument required to be registered by any Act of the present session for amending the law relating to bankruptcy and insolvency in England."

It was unanimously resolved "That the principle of levying a tax for the benefit of the general community on those who have already suffered the loss of their property is highly objectionable; and that the particular proposal to tax insolvent estates, requiring the minimum amount of interference on the part of the Court, with such an oppressive duty is grossly excessive and unjustifiable." As the resolution referred to was to be considered in the House of Commons that night, it was decided that the following telegram should be sent from the meeting to Thomas Bazley, Esq., M.P., and that similar telegrams should be sent to Edward Baines, Esq., M.P., E. A. Leatham, Esq., M.P., and W. E. Forster, Esq., M.P. Telegram:—"A meeting of the Chambers of Commerce of Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford, and the Manchester Association and Manchester Guardian Society, is now being held. We are unanimous in considering the imposition of seven shillings per cent. on deeds of arrangement as grossly excessive, and calculated to interfere with that mode of settlement. We object to taxation based on the misfortune of creditors, and think even clause 201 as it stood in the Bill very excessive. Please confer with members for Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford." The meeting then discussed the "remarks and suggestions of the committee of the Manchester Association for the Protection of Trade," dated February 16, 1861, and it was decided that leaving points of minute detail for future settlement, the attention of the conference should be chiefly directed to those clauses of the Bill referring to the extension of jurisdiction in bankruptcy to county courts, the position and remuneration of official assignees, and to the duties and responsibilities of the creditors' assignee. It was stated that the committee of the Manchester Association had objected to the transfer of bankruptcy business to county courts, on the grounds set forth in the printed "Remarks and Suggestions" now under consideration. But if the consent of a majority, in number as well as value, of the creditors would be necessary to transfer the proceedings to a county court, in cases where the assets exceed £300, and the same principles were applied to estates under £300, the committee was not disposed to press the objection to these clauses, feeling satisfied that any evils which might arise would cure themselves. The members of the conference from Leeds, Huddersfield, and Bradford urged very strong reasons in favour of local adjudication, particularly in cases where the debtor and his creditors resided in the same locality, but concurred in the propriety of requiring the consent of number as well as value to the transfer, and of granting the same power of removal to creditors under clause 106 (105 in Bill reprinted), as in other cases. Clauses 6 to 11, 106, and 119 were then considered; and after a full discussion of the question, all these clauses were agreed to, subject to an alteration in clause 106 (105 in Bill reprinted), compelling all debtors within a defined distance of a district court to petition such court, giving to a majority in number and value of the creditors power to remove the proceedings into a district court; an amendment in clause 119 (118 in Bill reprinted), requiring the consent of a majority in number as well as value; and such a modification of clause 99 as shall give the court power to order the removal of proceedings in certain cases to any court they may think proper, without the necessity of applying to the chief judge. It was unanimously agreed that the office of messenger ought to be abolished, and the duties performed by the official assignee as to possession of the estate, and as to other matters as general orders may direct. It was agreed that the words "if such official assignee," in the first line, page 30 (30th line, page 29, in Bill reprinted), ought to be struck out, as it is considered undesirable that the discretion as to retaining possession of a bankrupt's estate should be vested in the official assignee. Such discretion should be limited to the court, "on the representation of the official assignee," or of any creditor. The meeting unanimously approved of the payment of the official assignee by fixed salary instead of by percentage, and considered the salaries proposed in the Bill amply sufficient, and resolved strenuously to oppose any attempt which might be made to adopt a contrary principle during the future stages of the Bill. The clauses of the Bill referring to the creditors' assignee were then considered, and it was unanimously agreed that the clauses referring to the duties and responsibilities of the creditors' assignees, and which provide that every three months his accounts shall be verified upon oath, and submitted to the audit of the official assignee—he shall find security if a majority of the creditors and the Court require it—shall be liable to dismissal by a majority in value of the creditors—may at any time be called upon by one-fourth in value of the creditors to show cause why he should not be dismissed; and shall be compelled to call a meeting of the creditors to pass judgment upon his conduct before he can obtain his final discharge, are such as would prevent any mercantile man undertaking the office; and that with the view of removing these objectionable features from the Bill, the following amendments be proposed:—The power to require the creditors' assignee to give security is altogether objected to. If the principle of appointing a manager be adopted, his appointment ought to be vested in the creditors' assignee, with the sanction of the Court, but it is thought the manager ought to find security in some cases, and with that view it is proposed that in line 34 (25 in Bill reprinted), page 32, after the word "terms," the words "as to security or otherwise" be added; and that in line 35 (26 in Bill reprinted), the word "majority" be struck out, and the word "court" be substituted. The power here given to the creditors to remove the creditors' assignee is altogether objected to. In case of misconduct of the creditors' assignee, clause 146 (145 in the Bill reprinted), gives to the court sufficient power to remove such assignee. It is therefore proposed that this clause be struck out of the Bill. This clause should be so altered as to leave it entirely optional with the creditors whether the official assignee or the creditors' assignee shall collect all debts. But in any case there ought to be no distinction as to amount, as the possession of the books is indispensable for the collection of both large and small debts. This clause, by requiring the creditors' assignee to submit his accounts to the official assignee virtually places the representative of the creditors under the control of that officer. On the whole it is deemed less objectionable to substitute the registrar for the official assignee in this clause; and it is thought that after the first meeting, which should be within a fixed period, it is altogether unnecessary to hold any subsequent meetings at stated periods, as considerable expense would be thereby entailed on the estate. These meetings should be left to the discretion of the Court. It is therefore proposed to strike out the words "expiration of every succeeding three months," and to insert the words "at the discretion of the court" in lieu thereof, and to strike out the words "the official assignee in the presence of" in the 16th, 17th, and 18th lines (7, 8, and 9 in Bill reprinted); and the words "verified on oath as," in the 20th line (11th in Bill reprinted); and to substitute the word "registrar" for the words "official assignee" in the 24th line (15th in Bill reprinted). The creditors' assignee would be subject to great annoyance and inconvenience if the creditors were empowered to transmit proofs of debt to him, and frequent disputes would arise as to the fact of such transmission. Proofs ought in all cases to be sent to the official assignee. It is therefore proposed to strike out the words "before the appointment of the creditors' assignee," in line 36 (22 in Bill reprinted); and the words "and after such appointment to the creditors' assignee," in lines 37 and 38 (23 and 24 in Bill reprinted). Sect. 6. Accepting bills of exchange for the accommodation of others for which no value has been received, ought to be included in the grounds of objection to granting a discharge to a bankrupt as "trading on fictitious capital" takes in only one side of the transaction, and relates to the drafter of such bills only; whereas the creditors of the acceptor may have to suffer in consequence of such bills being proved against his estate. That after the word "dividend" in the ninth line the words "out of any realisable estate" be added, so as to bring the clause into harmony with clauses 187 and 188 (189 and 190 Bill reprinted). In other respects this clause needs considerable modification, as the provision requiring the assignee to call the meeting in question to sit in judgment on his conduct is highly objectionable. This clause is regarded as most objectionable, because it will enable a debtor to compel creditors whose debts are represented by bills to accept an arrangement to which their consent has not even been asked, and it would thus be open to great abuse. Sufficient protection to the debtor would be given, and the above objection would be removed by omitting the words "three-fourths in number and value of all his other creditors," and substituting the words "the persons with whom the debts represented by such bills of exchange, &c., were originally contracted." The words "a majority in number" should be inserted before the words "three-fourths" in the first line. The conference then unanimously resolved that with the view of insuring the adoption of these several amendments in the Bill when it reaches the House of Lords, it was desirable that a deputation, to consist of gentlemen from each of the associations and chambers of commerce represented at the conference to-day, should proceed to London, to seek an interview with the Lord Chancellor, and to confer with other members of the House of Lords, and to take such other steps as may seem desirable to secure the success of the Bill with the proposed amendments.

BILLS IN PARLIAMENT

FOR THE FORMATION OF NEW LINES OF RAILWAY IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

The standing orders have been declared to have been complied with in the following cases:—

BRENTFORD AND KEW BRIDGE.
EDGEWARE, HIGHGATE, AND LONDON.
LLANIDLOES AND NEWTOWN.

NEWTOWN.

SHEREWSBURY AND WELCHPOOL.

The preamble of the following Bill has been proved in the House of Lords:—

LEEDS, BRADFORD, AND HALIFAX.

The following has been referred to a committee of the House of Commons:—

LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE (Salford to Manchester).

REPORTS AND MEETINGS.

GREAT WESTERN OF CANADA RAILWAY.

At the half-yearly meeting of this company held on the 11th instant, a dividend at the rate of £3 per cent. per annum was declared for the past half-year.

MONMOUTHSHIRE RAILWAY.

The directors of this company propose that a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, should be declared for the half year ending December 31st 1860. This leaves a balance of £900 to be carried to the reserve fund.

The number of causes and other matters set down for hearing in the ensuing term appear to be as follows, viz.:—In the Court of Queen's Bench there are 87 rules, of which 40 are in the new trial paper for argument and 43 in the special paper, in addition to which there are four enlarged rules. In the Common Pleas there are eight enlarged rules, 16 in the new trial paper, two matters for the decision of the Court, and 20 demurrers, making 45; while in the Court of Exchequer the number is 34, consisting of nine errors and appeals, two rules in the special paper for judgment and eight for argument, and in the new trial paper two for judgment and 13 for argument. In the Court of Chancery there are 344 causes entered for hearing; of which 12 are before the Lords Justices, 73 before the Master of the Rolls, 69 before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, 92 before Vice-Chancellor Stuart, and 98 before Vice-Chancellor Wood. The Judges, Queen's Counsel, and other learned functionaries, will breakfast with the Lord Chancellor at Stratheden-house on the first day of term, and afterwards proceed to inaugurate the Term at Westminster-hall.

On Saturday morning, the 6th inst, about three o'clock, a fire resulting in the entire destruction of one of the finest mansions in the county of Surrey took place at Burhill Park, the seat of Mr. Francis Thomas Bircham, solicitor to the South Western Railway Company, situate near Walton-on-Thames. The family made their escape, with the exception of Mr. Bircham, who, in his endeavours to save a large quantity of valuable plate (in which to some extent he succeeded), was very considerably burnt. The whole of the furniture, valuable paintings, a large proportion of the plate, &c., has been utterly destroyed or lies buried in the ruins. The property was insured in the Law Fire and Life Insurance-office, of which Mr. Bircham is himself a director, for the sum of £6,000, but that will not cover the amount at which the property destroyed is valued.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, APRIL 20, 1861.

CURRENT TOPICS.

Of all the numerous Bills affecting the law and the interests of lawyers, the only one of any importance which has received the sanction of Parliament in the present session is the one which provides for increasing the facilities for the transfer of the public stocks and annuities. We stated last week the effect of the provisions contained in this statute. The Lord Chancellor's Bill to amend the law relating to trade marks has passed the House of Lords, and received a second reading in the House of Commons. Probably in the course of a few days it will be enacted; and we shall then be prepared without delay to commence a series of useful papers upon the general law of trade marks, and upon the new Act of Parliament. Sir Richard Bethell has also brought in a Bill upon a cognate subject, namely, Copyright in Works of Art. Should this become law, as most likely it will, we hope to present our readers with a useful and timely commentary upon the statute. The Statute Law Revision Bill, of which we gave a detailed account in a former number of this Journal, has been referred to a select committee of the House of Commons, and notwithstanding some opposition from Mr. Whiteside, is almost certain to receive the sanction of Parliament before the session closes. The Lord Chancellor's Lunacy Regulation Bill contains some useful provisions enabling the Lord Chancellor in certain cases to apply the property of a lunatic for his benefit in a summary manner without inquisition where the amount of the property does not exceed £500 in value. This Bill also contains some valuable provisions relating to the visitation of lunatics. Lord Kingsdown has just introduced a Bill to amend the law with respect to wills of personal estate. It proposes that every will made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject, shall, as regards personal estate, be admitted to probate if made according to the forms required "either by the law of the place where the same was made, or by the law of the place where such person was domiciled when the same was made, or by the laws then in force in any part of the United Kingdom." The Bill for enabling boroughs containing 25,000 inhabitants to provide for the appointment of stipendiary magistrates has not yet received any discussion, and not having been introduced by the Government is not very likely to be added to our statute book this year. The Trustees of Charities Bill has been lost in the House of Commons. Sir Richard Bethell's great bankruptcy measure has received a very rough handling in the House of Lords from Lord Chelmsford and Lord Kingsdown. The former noble lord was opposed especially to the transfer of bankruptcy jurisdiction to county court judges, one of his strongest reasons being that the registrar of a county court would be made to discharge, in addition to his present multifarious duties, those of an official assignee. Lord Kingsdown objected strongly to the abolition of the distinction between traders and non-traders, for the purposes of the Act; and also to the appointment of the new Appellate Judge. His lordship suggested that no persons could be more competent to hear appeals from the Bankruptcy Commissioners than the Equity Judges. Lord Cranworth also expressed his opinion against the appointment of a chief judge in bankruptcy; and, indeed, the opinion that no such new functionary is required is now becoming generally entertained.

The recent general order of Chancery relating to the mode of taking evidence in that court, came into operation on the first day of the present term; but does not appear to have yet produced any observable effect upon the practice of the Court. It is, however, rather too soon to judge of the extent or character of its operation, as the orders apply only to causes in which "issue is joined" on the first day of Easter Term or subsequently, and therefore none of these causes can yet have come on for hearing. It will require a few weeks longer to discover how far suitors are now availing themselves of their power to have their causes determined upon oral examination in open court. It may not have been generally noticed by practitioners, but it appears to be the fact, that the new order does not apply to causes coming on upon motion for decree, but only to those in which "issue is joined." The effect of this restriction will be very much to limit the application of the order, as in a very large proportion of causes replication is never filed and issue is never joined, but they are determined upon motion for decree according to the modern practice. It was, however, probably intended by the chancery judges to make the experiment of oral examinations in court upon a somewhat limited scale; but in case the new system should be found to work well there appears to be no reason why it should not be applicable to all chancery causes.

The question whether a clerk of the peace for a borough can exercise his functions by deputy is now under discussion in the Leeds Town Council; and as the point is one of some importance to many of our readers, we propose to devote a few lines to its consideration. There is no doubt that the clerk of the peace in counties may act by deputy, for the 1 W. & M., sess. 1, c. 21, s. 5, empowers him to execute his office in person, "or by his sufficient deputy;" and, accordingly, in some counties the clerk of the peace is in effect a mere sinecurist, pocketing an immense income, while all his duties are performed by the deputy. The Municipal Corporation Act, however, 3 & 6 Wm. 4, c. 76, s. 103, merely provides that "the council of every borough shall appoint a fit person to be clerk of the peace during his good behaviour," and says nothing of a deputy. The borough clerk of the peace, therefore, derives no power to appoint a deputy from the statute under which he himself is appointed; and the question seems to resolve itself into this—whether he has any such power at common law? Now it is laid down in the books that offices may be distinguished into offices of trust (comprising those which are judicial) and offices merely ministerial. The former cannot in general be performed by deputy, the latter usually may (3 St. Com. 18, 1st ed.). If this statement stood alone there would seem to be little doubt that the clerk of the peace of a borough might perform his office by deputy, as it appears to fall under the head of offices "merely ministerial." There is, however, a case of Rez v. Gravesend, 2 B. & C. 602, which casts considerable doubt upon the general proposition that a ministerial office may, as a whole, be deputed. In that case the sub-seneschal of a corporation created by charter, which also gave the corporation the power to elect the sub-seneschal, had appointed a deputy to perform on his behalf the several ministerial duties belonging to his office. The corporation refused to allow the deputy to act, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that they were right; Lord Tenterden observing that the admission of the deputy to do all ministerial acts would be to make him a corporate officer, and that the law of the land did not allow such an appointment, unless it was provided for by the charter. These expressions of Lord Tenterden's appear to be strongly against the right of a clerk of the peace, appointed under the Municipal Corporation Act, to appoint a deputy who would thus in his lordship's words become a corporate officer. If a ministerial officer, appointed under a charter, cannot appoint a deputy without an express provision to that effect, it is difficult to see how a ministerial officer, appointed under the provisions of a statute, can do so. The very fact, moreover, that it was deemed necessary by the 1 W. & M., sess. 1, c. 21, s. 5, to give to the clerks of the peace then known to the law, an express power to act by deputy, seems to imply that they would not have possessed such power had it not been conferred upon them by statute.

It does not seem that any argument in favour of the power of a clerk of the peace of a borough to appoint a deputy can be drawn from the statute of William and Mary, as the clerks of the peace contemplated by that statute are wholly different officers from those appointed under the Municipal Corporation Act, and the appointment of a deputy under the former Act must be confirmed by the custos rotulorum, an officer who, eo nomine, at all events has no existence in corporations.

Although it appears to us very doubtful, for the reasons which we have stated, whether a clerk of the peace for a borough can appoint a deputy to exercise all his own functions, it is quite another question whether such a power might not be conveniently conferred upon him. We entertain very little doubt that it might, so far as the public are concerned. Judging from the debates in the Leeds Town Council, there seems to be no pretence whatever for saying that the duties of the clerk of the peace have not been efficiently performed by his deputy. Looking at the question, however, in a professional point of view, it is fairly open to argument whether the appointment of a deputy by such an officer as the clerk of the peace is desirable. When the office becomes vacant, by the death or resignation of the clerk himself, the council must then elect another clerk, and the gentleman who may for some years have acted as deputy, has a very superior chance of success as against all his competitors, so much so, indeed, that if he has performed his duties with average ability and diligence, it would seem almost invidious to elect a stranger. In fact, the appointment of a deputy by the clerk of the peace will virtually, in most cases, take the power of appointing his successor out of the hands of the council, and vest it in his own, thus making the office a kind of heir-loom in a family, or in a firm. As to whether such a course is advantageous to the profession as a whole, we hesitate to pronounce any decided opinion, and can only conclude with Sir Roger de Coverley—that much may be said on both sides of the question.

OUR COURTS OF APPEAL.

We should as soon think of composing a thesis in laudem philosophiæ as of entering upon any lengthened argument to prove the necessity that exists in every system of jurisprudence for well-constituted courts of appeal. The court of ultimate resort is the key-stone of the judicial arch. It should certainly possess an inherent superiority over the subordinate tribunals whose action it regulates. Not only are the lower courts dependent for efficient direction upon the appellate judicature to which they are subject; but the law itself, in all its departments, however excellent, considered abstractedly, very much owes its practical character to the manner in which it is administered by the highest tribunals. We cited ante (vol. 4, pp. 943, 951), a number of cases illustrating the abnormal character of our English appellate courts, and the uncertainty that often exists whether the final decision in any case may not be opposed to the opinions of the majority of the judges of Westminster Hall or Lincoln's-inn. This surely is a state of things which tends to encourage and prolong litigation in its most vexatious form.

The report of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors on the Law and Equity Bill of last year concludes by recommending "that no attempt should be made to alter our tribunals, until a careful revision has been made of our whole law." This consummation, however, is a contingency somewhat too remote to be patiently waited for by those who seek a reform of our courts. Yet the observation we have quoted implies a principle which is not to be rejected even by those who, contrary to the opinion expressed in the report, advocate a speedy fusion of our systems of law and equity. That principle is the harmony that should exist between the constitution of tribunals, and the laws which they administer. All changes in the constitution of our courts, if intended to be permanent, should have a relation to the genius and spirit of those reforms which are likely to be realized, and anticipate their tendencies, so far as this can be effected without a sacrifice of present efficiency. It is almost idle now to discuss the comparative utility of distinct or united systems of equity and law. The fusion is not yet accomplished. But, perhaps, it is more nearly so than the majority of lawyers expect. Has not common law accepted the compulsory donations of equity contained in the Common Law Procedure Acts? and so, on the other hand, we find common law jurisdiction and procedure largely introduced of late into Chancery. The old exclusiveness of both systems has ceased to exist. Each, indeed, still seems disposed to extort concessions from the other without professing to desire a strict partnership. But these concessions and compromises are but the terms of an armistice which is certain some day to result in a thorough union. Reform, then, when applied to our appellate judicature, should note these tendencies and propose no innovation that will not provide both for present wants and probable emergencies of the future. The only division of labour which the nature of things recognizes as inherent in judicial administration is the division of causes into those of law and those of fact. We concur with the opinion expressed by Lord St. Leonards, in his report on the Chancery Evidence Commission last year, that a Nisi Prius tumult is not congenial to courts of equity, nor to any tribunal whose chief business is the determination of questions of law. But we see no difference in the conditions requisite to the effective working of a court of equity and those which are connected with a purely legal tribunal, such, for instance, as the Exchequer Chamber, which is exclusively concerned with questions of law. It is the same habit of mind, the same analytic reasoning, that is required to determine the difficult niceties of a recovery, an ejectment, or a remitter, and the equally subtle rules relating to equitable conversion or constructive notice. It is unnecessary for us, however, to discuss the alleged essential distinctions between law and equity, or to deny the analogy between the Roman Prætorian law and our Chancery. Our legislation, for the last ten years, has proceeded on the assumption that the existing distinctions are but the deductions of a technical sagacity, reasoning from erroneous or fictitious data. The tendencies of Reform being in the same direction, the barrier between the two systems, if it shall not be completely removed by a single statute, is sure to be levelled by successive assaults.

As our systems of law and equity have never had separate courts of final appeal, we may inquire, why should there not be a confluence of jurisdictions preliminary to the House of Lords? There is surely no a priori objection to the establishment of a court which should unite the present functions—although not the several constituent members—of the Courts of Appeal in Chancery, and of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and which should be so constituted, both as to the number and rank of its judges, as to be calculated to give satisfaction to suitors. The Lord Chancellor, Lords Justices, and the chief common law judges, would, perhaps, constitute a court of the required efficiency. The Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland is, in principle, although not in its constitution, the model which we propose for imitation. This Court adjudicates upon appeals both from the Irish Courts of Equity and also from the Landed Estates Court, which is a court both of law and equity. It has thus both a legal and equitable jurisdiction in all causes relating to land. It is defective, indeed, in point of numerical strength; but that objection might be easily obviated. One of the objects sought to be attained by the establishment of this court, was the rendering of appeals to the House of Lords unnecessary. This advantage, though not of equal urgency on this side of the channel, is, nevertheless, valuable as an impediment to protracted litigation, and as rendering the difficulties which oppose a reform of the Lords' Appellate Court less hurtful in their results. An effective appeal court should, of course, sit as continuously as the pressure of business would require; but the appeals to the Exchequer Chamber and to the Chancery Appeal Courts, if added together, scarcely transcend the amount of work capable of being transacted by a single court. The members of this tribunal could likewise, in rotation, attend their own courts, leaving however a sufficient quorum to sit as continuously as might be required.

Notwithstanding the theoretical distinctness of our judicial systems, cases are continually escaping from their original sphere, and, like so many comets, threaten mischief and confusion to the region in which they next present themselves. Thus in Bateman v. Freeston, 9 W. R. 311, a bankrupt was arrested under a ca. sa. issued upon a certificate granted by the Commissioner under the 12 & 13 Vict., c. 106, s. 257 (the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act), and before the day appointed for the bankrupt's final examination, but after the day fixed for final examination, another creditor obtained a like certificate, upon which he also issued a ca. sa., and lodged a detainer with the sheriff. The Court of Exchequer, in Ochford v. Freeston, and Chapman v. Freeston, 9 W. R. 315, had held the first arrest illegal, and the detainer under the second ca. sa. likewise invalid. The Court of Queen's Bench held in Bateman v. Freeston, that assuming the first arrest to be illegal, which was their opinion, the detainer by the second creditor was nevertheless valid. Now, Hooper v. Lane, 6 Ho. of L. C. 443; 6 W. R. 146; unanimously decided by all the law lords, expressly determines the contrary, and was relied on by the Court of Exchequer in the cases above cited. Finally, in Ex parte Freeston, 9 W. R. 321, the full Court of Appeal in Chancery decided in accordance with the decision of the Court of Exchequer. Thus was a decision in bankruptcy the subject of conflicting decisions at law and in equity, both classes of courts recognizing no common ligamen. While our appellate courts enjoy little inherent authority as distinguished from the necessarily conclusive nature of their judgments, we cannot feel so much surprised at the apparent rashness of the Court of Queen's Bench, from which we should have expected a sound judgment upon a question of habeas corpus, in overlooking the authority of Hooper v. Lane, which certainly seems to harmonize with the first principles of law as well as of common sense. It may be asked if an appellate court be constituted of the strength we recommend, where are we to get judges for the House of Lords, who will preponderate both in numbers and influence over the intermediate Court of Appeal? We shall now enter upon this stage of our review, premising that an intermediate Appellate Court of adequate strength would strongly tend to diminish the number of final appeals.

The existence of two distinct Supreme Courts of Appeal does seem to violate the theoretical harmony at which our legal system should aim. The House of Lords, as our readers are aware, adjudicates upon appeals in law and equity, and also upon those brought from the Courts of Probate and Divorce, while the province of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council comprises all appeals from the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, and all foreign British possessions, as also appeals from the Admiralty and Ecclesiastical Courts. A single supreme court of appeal is, doubtless, the natural apex to a scientific system of judicature. If, however, the Lords' Appellate Court was calculated to give equal satisfaction with that given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, this divided operation of our supreme appellate courts would be comparatively unimportant.

The transference of the judicial functions of the House of Lords to the Privy Council, though sometimes mooted, does not, we think, find general acceptance. The transference of the duties of the latter Supreme Court to the House of Lords has not been much discussed, simply because the Judicial Committee has been found to work exceedingly well, and all the members of that Court should be raised to the peerage before they could adjudicate in the Lords' Appellate Court. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is generally regarded as a model appeal court; the House of Lords, on the other hand, must be admitted to be frequently deficient in judicial force. The decision of a final court of appeal upon uncertain questions of law is equivalent to an Act of Parliament, the House of Lords never having, so far as we are aware, reversed its own decision upon the same state of facts. Now if we would not desire that a triumvirate of law lords should be substituted for the Queen, Lords, and Commons, in matters of legislation, why should we consider the number three as denoting an adequate attendance of lords at the hearing of appeals, the decisions upon which are the ultimate and only indisputable definitions of the law? The attendance of members of the House, except the Chancellor, is voluntary, and the average attendance of law lords is not considered adequate. In the session of 1855, for some weeks, only two law lords, the Lord Chancellor and Lord St. Leonards, sat to hear appeals, and upon some of these they differed and proceeded to a decision which operated as a confirmation of the judgment appealed against. This unsatisfactory state of things awakened the attention of Government to the necessity that existed for increasing the judicial force of the House. The system of life peerages was then unsuccessfully proposed, and we are now in the same predicament in which we were in 1855. We cannot, indeed, complain at present of appeals being heard only by one or two law lords; but, as the House is at present constituted, such a contingency is by no means unlikely to occur again. Of the various plans proposed for strengthening the judicial force of the House, none appears to us more efficacious, or less open to objection, than the expedient of giving the Crown power to confer life peerages upon the chief judges of our law and equity courts, or upon the members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, or upon a limited number of persons who have filled similarly high judicial offices. No doubt, all inroads upon the supposed primary principles of our constitution are to be avoided; but we do not see how the desire that the House of Lords should retain its present judicial functions, as this appears to be the public wish upon the matter, can be effectuated, and yet that these functions are to be effectively discharged, while the attendance of the law members of the House is as precarious as it is at present. That the power to create life peers might be abused by the minister of the day does not appear to us to be a strong objection to the measure, inasmuch as ministers of different principles would have each a control over appointments to the vacancies that might occur during his tenure of office. Unless the death of a life peer happened at a conjuncture when a vote in the Upper House would be a sufficient temptation to a minister to brave public opinion, and determine his selection on political grounds only, the temptation to make an improper choice does not appear likely to exist. Moreover, life peers might be expected to keep as much aloof from political discussions as lay members of the House do from interfering with judicial adjudications. If, however, the system of life peerages be disapproved of as contravening supposed ancient usage, another remedy is available, which, although seemingly unconstitutional, is, nevertheless, of most undoubted antiquity. This resource is the calling upon judges or lawyers, not members of the House, and giving them the power of joining in the decisions. As constitutional precedent favours this course, is it not an obvious remedy for the existing defect to give such powers to the members of the Privy Council, or to the members of the Chancery Appeal Court? At all events, it is unreasonable to find fault both with the existing constitution of the Lords' Appellate Court, and also with every measure calculated to supply the existing defects. If the Lords' Appellate Court comprised an adequate amount of judicial strength, there would not, of course, be the present grounds for violating the symmetry of our legal system by the existence of two distinct supreme courts of appeal.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn,

The case of Brook v. Brook, referred to in my last article (on appeal, 9 W. R. 461), shows that Scotland for many purposes is a foreign country, and, as I have often had occasion to observe, especially in the case of domicil. This is well illustrated by the case of Macaren v. Stainton, 22 L. J., N. S., Ch. 274, & 26, ibid. 332. In that case Henry Stainton, who was domiciled in England, was the London agent of the Carron Iron Company, and was so at the time of his death, being then the holder of 101 shares in the company, worth £80,000. His personalty amounted to £182,000, and he was likewise possessed of large real estate in Scotland. His will was proved in England and Scotland, and the Carron Iron Company brought an action against his executors in the Court of Session for £100,000 alleged to be due on a balance of accounts, and the company obtained letters of arrestment against the real estate in Scotland. A bill was filed in England by the executors against the Carron Company to restrain that action, and the case coming on at the Rolls the Master of the Rolls granted the injunction, and afterwards dismissed a motion to dissolve it. On appeal to the House of Lords this decision was reversed. Another suit was then instituted by the executors, and an injunction similar to the other was moved for before the full Court of Appeal, when the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices refused the motion with costs. This decision at first sight would seem to trench upon the rule that property is regulated by the law of the country in which a party dies domiciled; but, upon looking into the matter, it will be seen that it does not do so. This was a question of jurisdiction merely, and involved the right of the courts of one country to interfere with the proceedings of the courts of another country as relating to property in that country, not mere personalty, or moveable, but realty, and therefore a part of the soil. Now, the rule that I adverted to, applies, I imagine, exclusively to personalty, otherwise this evil would follow, that the mere fact of the owner of perhaps half the real estate in one country, gaining a domicil in another, would take away all the powers of the law of the country where the realty was situated, over that property upon so slight a circumstance, and deprive the Government of their dues; this could never have been intended, and therefore, the decision in the case of Macaren v. Stainton is perfectly in consonance with justice, although the judgment delivered by their lordships does not go fully into the principle.

There seems to have been at different times a question made with respect to the effect of gaining a domicil abroad, as regards the rights attached to the character of a native of a particular country, and it must be confessed there is some difficulty in dealing with such a question, because we are confused with words, and it is therefore necessary to go to the root of the matter to apply the principles of the law to it. It is a great principle of the English legislation that no native of this country should be ever without the means of sustaining life; and hence we have what is very properly called "a poor law;" and the fact that it is surrounded with official difficulties, sufficient sometimes to render it abortive, does not alter the case. At the same time we are not anxious to increase such a burthen, and therefore, if a man has no settlement here, although even then he may be temporarily relieved under the "casual pauper enactment," he must seek relief where he is settled. Where a man has no domicil he can have no settlement, although the same rule may not hold good as a converse proposition; for although in old times settlement and domicil were certainly identical words, domicil is now such a very uncertain thing that it cannot for a moment compete with the fact of a settlement. A domicil, moreover, is chiefly established to avoid government duties, or to gain some advantage under the shadow of a foreign law, whereas settlement would be rather forced upon our government officers than sought to be established by them, as they would lose and not gain by its proof. A domicil may take an English subject entirely beyond the reach of liability to our law in matters of impost, and virtually so in matters of debt. Indeed, it would be only by the permission of a foreign government that any species of legislative power could be exercised over a British subject domiciled abroad with no property in England. The process of naturalization is regulated by statute, and must therefore differ, as in fact it does, in different countries, and the civil rights thus conferred are very distinguishable from the liabilities to which the property of the naturalized person is subject by the fact of his being domiciled where he is naturalized; and, therefore, it follows that although a British subject naturalized abroad, or a Frenchman naturalized in England, may whilst they and all their property remain in that which to them is a foreign country, acquire certain civil rights there, yet, they do not ipso facto lose their nationality, but at any moment by returning regain them, if indeed, they have ever lost them. If therefore comes to this, that whilst a person is domiciled and resident abroad, so far as civil liabilities are concerned, our law cannot forcibly touch him; but there is nothing to prevent his return at any moment to England, when those liabilities to which every British born subject is liable would, I apprehend, attach; and if so, why should he not also be entitled to civil rights? not, of course, that that would be a sequitur in the case of a foreigner. The object of naturalization is to gain something; but like domicil it is only operative as between the object and the government by which the naturalization is granted, and does not, prima facie, abrogate nationality. Thus it was laid down in the case of Duncan v. Cannan, 18 Beav. 128 (13 Beav. 366) that there is no foundation for the argument or notion that a Scotchman by birth cannot acquire a domicil without repudiating his nationality; but it was doubted whether a foreigner could acquire a civil domicil in France without the authorization of the French Government. It was also decided that a Scotchwoman domiciled in England, might still give a receipt to the trustees of a settlement made upon her in the Scotch form. The fact is, that domicil affects the property rather than the person; and although a native of one country may by the proper legal forms acquire certain rights in another, those rights are not affected by the domicil, and a person may either lose or acquire a domicile without such loss in the least affecting the rights he or she may have acquired by naturalization, or in any legal manner. With respect to the recognition of acts done in a foreign country, either by a party in his own right, or in right of another, the following appears to be the law. If a party applies for letters of administration in this country, to an intestate domiciled abroad, having already obtained a grant in the proper court of the country where the intestate was domiciled, it would seem that the ecclesiastical court in this country, generally speaking, will follow such grant. "Williams' Executors," 1—376. In re Goods of Morgan, 2 Roberts 415. But if the original administration be applied for in this country, in such case, where the deceased was a British subject or an alien, since in either event the distribution of his personal property is to be regulated according to the laws of the country of which he was a domiciled inhabitant at the time of his death, it appears to be a necessary consequence that the grant should be made to the person entitled to the effects of the deceased according to the law of that country; ibid. A foreigner dying in this country in itinere, the law of this country will not recognise the right of a foreign consul to take possession of his goods, 2 Curt. 274; Atkins v. Smith, 2 Atk. 63; Barnes v. Cole, Ambl. 416; Doe v. Vardill, 5 B & C. 451, s.c. 2 Cl. & Fin. 571, 7 ibid. 895, sub nom. Birtwhistle v. Vardill.

Where a party entitled to administration is resident abroad, he must have notice before administration can be granted to another person. Goddard v. Creponier, 3 Phill. 637. So in the West Indies, Miller v. Washington, 3 Hagg. 277; "Williams' Ex." 1—385. If a foreigner dies intestate in the British dominions, administration will be granted according to the law of his own country. In re Goods of Biggin, 1 Add. 340; In re Goods of Countess de Cunha, 1 Hagg. 239; In re Goods of Stewart, 1 Curt. 904; In re Goods of Rogerson, 2 Curt. 656. In Scotland the same rule applies. The ambassador must certify the law of the country of which such foreigner is a native. In re Goods of Dormoy, 3 Hagg. 767.

If an intestate is domiciled abroad, or within the sovereign's dominions out of this country, and has left assets here, administration must be taken out here as well in the country of the domicile. Le Breton v. Le Quesne, 2 Cas. temp. Lee, 261; Attorney General v. Bonwens, 4 M. & W. 193.

CHAP. X.

OF RESIDENCE IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES.

We have seen the view which our law takes of the abandonment of either a domicile of origin, or an acquired domicile, in the simple and ordinary case of leaving a native country, settling abroad, so as to become a subject of a foreign state, and then returning to the domicile of birth, and there dying; but the case which involves the greatest difficulty is that in which the party has resided in an indefinite number of places, had establishments, perhaps in all, and even kept up several at the same time. Such a case is almost sufficiently difficult to baffle our endeavours to apply the well-known principles; and it is only by supposing a number of circumstances applicable to such cases, and considering the cases which have occurred, and upon which decisions have been come to, that we can arrive at anything like a conclusion. Every man must be possessed of some kind of property, and therefore, in such cases as that now under consideration, it is of importance to turn the attention to this point. Suppose a man having spent the greater part of his life in business, retires from his labours upon a competence, gives up housekeeping, disposes of his effects, and goes abroad, intending to devote the remainder of his life to change of scene, and the exploring of other countries, and to this end, travels from place to place, regulating his sojourn in each according to his caprice, or the inducements he there finds to shorten or prolong it, and ultimately dies in one of these excursions; in such a case there can be no doubt that the domicile of origin has not been displaced, and the least article of property left behind him in his native country would be sufficient, I apprehend, to fix such as his domicile, in the absence, of course, of any fixed intention appearing to reside elsewhere. Thus, if furniture or goods be left in the country which is the domicile of birth or origin, and the owner of them travels from place to place abroad; but being charmed with some particular locality, determines there to locate himself, sends for such furniture and goods; takes a residence and there establishes himself for even two years or one year, though he should afterwards travel into other countries, even into his own, yet if he leaves his establishment and furniture in such foreign country, or until he actually abandons such residence by total sale of his property, and the giving up of his house, such residence will determine his domicile, and the domicile of birth or origin having been abandoned, and a new one acquired, the acquired domicile becomes the domicile until it is abandoned; and in the absence of any such settling, the domicile of origin must, I apprehend, be again had recourse to. Cases have occurred in which a party has abandoned his original domicile, has acquired another, has abandoned that, has acquired another, and has then travelled about the world, having entirely broken up his establishment in the last place where the domicile was acquired, except that a few personal effects were left in such place in the care of a friend, there being still property existing in the second and acquired domicile; and yet as it clearly appeared that the last domicile was left merely for the sake of health; it was decided almost in the absence of all other evidence that the last acquired domicile was that to be considered as prevailing at the period of his death.

One great principle that is always acted upon in the cases of numerous and uncertain residence in different countries, is that a new domicile cannot be acquired by mere intention, however clearly evident; and therefore, if every species of property possessed by a person is converted into specie, and forms a part of his baggage, or even if such property, so converted, should be transmitted through a banker, or otherwise to another country, where the intention was to finally settle, unless the party does so settle, and remain long enough to be regarded as an inhabitant, with intention to remain, no new domicile is acquired; and if so, it follows, that the abandonment is only such in case of such new acquirement, and ceases to be an abandonment in case the new acquirement does not take effect. To decide otherwise would be in effect to say, that a man may have no domicile, a state of things quite inconsistent with the policy of the law. Circumstances as well as facts must be regarded in the consideration of this branch of the subject. What I mean is this:—The possession of property is a fact; but there may be ties both of interest and regard which so link a person to a particular country as to make it in the last degree improbable that he will ever abandon it. Thus, if an individual proceeds abroad upon a speculation, and hires a residence for a limited term renewed from time to time, but his position is such that he may return at any moment to his native soil, though the residence abroad is amply sufficient to secure him in a new domicile, yet, it appears clear that a constant probability of return, more particularly if it be added to circumstances making it a matter of certainty that he will do so, although the exact period is uncertain, will have the effect of retaining the original domicile and preventing the acquirement of a new one.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

April 15.—The April adjourned sessions commenced this morning at Clerkenwell before Mr. Bodkin, Assistant Judge, and a full bench of magistrates.

Mr. John Locke, Q.C., M.P. for Southwark, has accepted the recordership of Brighton, rendered vacant by the recent retirement of Mr. Edwin James.

It is rumoured that Mr. J. B. Maule, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Leeds, in the room of the late Mr. T. F. Ellis.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint George Hunter Cary, Esq., to be Attorney-General for the island of Vancouver.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, April 15.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

Their lordships went into committee on this Bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved an amendment, that instead of two medical visitors there should be but one, who should devote his whole time to the discharge of his duties.

The Earl of SHAPTESBURY thought the amendment indicated by the noble and learned lord would operate most beneficially. It was necessary that the medical officer should devote his time exclusively to the discharge of the duties intrusted to him under the Bill.

The Marquis of WESTMEATH regretted that no protection was given by the Bill to lunatics, who, though not dangerous, were yet unable to take care of themselves or their properties.

After a few words from the LORD CHANCELLOR,

The House went into committee on the Bill, when the amendments suggested by the Lord Chancellor were agreed to.

Tuesday, April 16.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, expressed a hope that it would meet with the approbation of the House, as he believed that the objections formerly entertained against it by their lordships had been met by the Bill before them. His lordship then gave the history of the past and present state of the law of bankruptcy; and having briefly touched upon the state of the law of insolvency, the abolition of the distinction of traders and non-traders, and the proposed alterations, he proceeded to explain the object of the Bill, and entered at some length into its various details.

Lord CHELMSFORD thought that the Bill, without considerable alterations, would hardly acquire the confidence of the country. In his opinion, the Attorney-General in drawing up this Bill had listened too much to the Mercantile Law Amendment Society, who represented one party on bankruptcy, and, consequently, had run entirely counter to the views of the other. By so doing the interests of the smaller estates had been sacrificed to the larger, and the machinery which this Bill proposed to introduce would be found far too cumbrous for smaller bankruptcies. In the case of the larger bankruptcies there would be a struggle for the post of creditors' assignee, while in that of the smaller the creditors would decline to appoint an assignee, and the estate would be left to the official assignee. There was also some danger of a collision between the creditors and the official assignees, and in that case what would become of the estate? The result of the present measure, with its proposed system of accounts and checks, and the addition of the creditors' assignee, instead of diminishing, would increase the expenses, and lead by collision between the assignees to a complete deadlock. In regard to the abolition of the distinction between traders and non-traders, he strongly objected to the retrospective clauses, and hoped that the House would agree to the amendments which he intended to introduce to prevent such retrospective effect. He strongly condemned the idea of adding a jurisdiction in bankruptcy to the various duties of the county court judges. He had no objection to their having jurisdiction in cases of insolvency. In conclusion he expressed a fervent hope that their lordships would not pass the Bill in its present state, but would, if a motion to the effect were made, refer it to a select committee.

Lord CRANWORTH thought the Bill contained many excellent provisions, and considered the mode in which it was proposed to abolish the distinction between traders and non-traders most satisfactory; and in regard to the retrospective power of these clauses he thought they were to a certain extent reasonable. As to the extension of the jurisdiction of the county court judges to bankruptcy cases, judging from the report of a commission which had been appointed to investigate the subject, he thought that it was impossible; on this subject, and also on the transfer of the duties of the official assignees, he should reserve his opinions. He also thought that the duties of the judge who was to preside over the new court required explanations. He could not think that the time of the chief judge could be occupied by the duties likely to devolve upon him; nor could he see the necessity for such a functionary with a salary of £5,000 a year, and a secretary of £300.

Lord KINGSDOWN examined the effects of the abolition of the distinction between traders and non-traders, and thought that while it was perfectly fair to give creditors summary powers in the case of the former, in the latter case it would lead to many hardships, especially in the case of inexperienced young men. He objected to the appointment of a judge, as he thought ten commissioners were quite capable of dealing with the matters brought before them. He asked whether it was becoming (as provided by the Bill) that the decision should rest with the judge whether or not he would permit his own ruling to be subjected to review. The Bill would lead to great confusion, and he did not expect that it would conduce to lessen the expenses of bankruptcy. The Bill, he hoped, would be considerably modified in committee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR briefly replied to the objections which had been raised. He opposed sending the Bill to a select committee; on going into committee he would answer at large the objections which had been brought against the Bill.

The Bill was then read a second time.

Thursday, April 18.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The Committee on this Bill was postponed until Friday, May 3.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, April 15.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL (LORDS).

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that the duty formerly assumed by the Statute Law Commissioners having devolved upon the Lord Chancellor, it appeared that the best mode of proceeding to consolidate the statutes was to ascertain of what the statutes actually consisted. Inquiries were made backwards from the end of the year 1858 to the 11th of George III., and a vast body of statutes were discovered which were indicated in the columns of this Bill, which were no longer in force. The object to be attained was the formation of what he might call an expurgated edition of the statute law, which appeared to be a most desirable thing, before they dealt with the consolidation of the law. He hoped, therefore, to obtain the sanction of the House to a series of statutes which would have for their ultimate end the production of a new edition of the statute law, which at present was contained in 42 folio, or large quarto volumes, but which would be reduced to less than one-fourth of that compass. They would then proceed to consolidation and arrangement. He then moved that the Bill be referred to a select committee.

Mr. WHITESIDE protested against a measure so ponderous in its dimensions, and so complicated and difficult in its character, being referred to a select committee.

After a few words from Mr. HADFIELD, in approval of the Bill, it was read a second time, and referred to a select committee.

COPYRIGHT IN WORKS OF ART.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to copyright in works of fine art. The artists of all nations in the world were invited to bring their works of art to this country in 1862. We had entered into treaties with other countries and established international copyright, yet there was not in this country any law that gave protection to copyright in works of the mind, which, above all others he considered were entitled to their protecting care.

Leave was then given to bring in the Bill, which was brought up and read a first time.

Wednesday, April 17.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT (1856) EXTENSION BILL.

This Bill was read a second time and passed.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

TRUSTEES OF CHARITIES BILL.

On the motion of Mr. Selwyn this Bill was ordered to be committed this day six months.

The Bill was, therefore, lost.

CHARITABLE USES.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

VOLUNTEERS TOLLS EXEMPTION BILL.

This Bill was withdrawn for the purpose of introducing another which would more precisely express the object of the measure.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

LUNACY REGULATION.

A BILL INTITULED AN ACT TO FURTHER DIMINISH THE EXPENSE OF PROCEEDINGS IN LUNACY, AND TO PROVIDE MORE EFFECTUALLY FOR THE VISITING OF LUNATICS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES.

1. Act may be cited as "The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1861."

2. Act shall be read and construed according to the interpretations contained in the second section of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70; and the provisions of the said Act (except so far as the same are altered by and are inconsistent with this Act) shall extend and apply to this Act.

3. This section gives power to the Lord Chancellor, where lunatic does not oppose application, and his property does not exceed £500 in value, to apply it for his benefit in a summary manner, without inquisition.

4. The Lord Chancellor may make orders for regulating the procedure to be adopted and the duties to be performed by the masters and officers in lunacy in carrying the objects of the last section into effect.

5. No person shall be entitled as of right to a traverse of any inquisition taken upon the oath of a jury, whereby any person shall be found lunatic, idiot, or of unsound mind; but any person desiring to traverse such an inquisition may, within three months next after the return of the same, present a petition for that purpose to the Lord Chancellor.

6. Provides that sects. 148 and 149 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, shall not apply to cases within the last preceding section.

7. Prescribes the duties of visitors.

8. Provides that all lunatics in licensed houses shall be visited once a year, in addition to visits by commissioners, and that all other lunatics shall be visited twice a year.

9. Repeals sections 104 and 105 of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70.

10. The visitors of lunatics and registrar in lunacy shall hold office during good behaviour, and may be removed therefrom by the Lord Chancellor.

11. Gives power to the Lord Chancellor to allow pensions to present visitors, if desirous of retiring, and to future visitors, if afflicted with permanent infirmity.

12. Provides for payment of pensions.

13. Declares that masters in lunacy shall not be members of the House of Commons.

14. The Accountant-General and all other persons, and the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, shall act upon all office copies of orders in lunacy purporting to be signed by the registrar in lunacy, and sealed with the seal of his office, in the same manner as such persons are by section one hundred and one of the said Act required to act upon office copies of reports confirmed by fiat.

COMMON LAW.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1856, s. 5—PAYMENT BY SURETY OR CO-DEBTOR, EFFECT OF.

Batchellor v. Lawrence, 9 C. P., W. R. 373.

This case throws light upon the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97); several of the provisions of which require some such assistance, both as respects their object and the mode in which they are to be worked. That one which is the subject of discussion in the present case is contained in the 5th section, which, in effect, enacts that every person who, being surety for the debt or duty of another, or being liable with another for any debt or duty, shall pay such debt or perform such duty, "shall be entitled to have assigned to him, or to a trustee for him, every judgment, specialty, or other security which shall be held by the creditor in respect of such debt or duty, whether such judgment, specialty, or other security shall be or shall not be deemed at law to have been satisfied by the payment of the debt or performance of the duty."

Now, the first thing we learn from the present case is the object of this provision; and this appears, from the judgment of Mr. Justice Williams, to have been to remedy the hardship with respect to assignments of judgments according to the previous doctrines upon that subject which prevailed in the courts of equity. It seems, for example, that where a surety paid off the bond after the death of the principal debtor, and took an assignment of the security,—he was considered as a simple contract creditor only of the estate of the principal debtor, because the action on the bond so assigned must be brought in the name of the obligee, and payment by the surety would be an answer to the demand. This was so laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Jones v. Davids (4 Russ. 277), and it was to remedy this defect that the clause in question was enacted.

Another point which arises on the section is, how is the right it gives to be enforced? It says, indeed, that the surety or person jointly liable who pays the debt or performs the duty shall be entitled to an assignment of the judgment or other security held by the creditor, but no special means are indicated for enforcing that right. But it appears by this case that an action will lie for the refusal or neglect to assign after request; and—that remedy existing—it seems to follow that the creditor could not be compelled to assign by force of the prerogative writ of mandamus, which lies only where an action will not; or, at least, where no effectual relief can be afforded thereby (see 3 Step. Com. 4th ed., p. 698). Whether the mandamus incidental to an action created by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (as. 68—76), would be granted in a case like the present is a question of some nicety, as the judgments given in Benson v. Paull (6 Ell. & Bl. 373), and Norris v. Irish Land Co. (8 Ell. & Bl. 512), have left the law with regard to the scope of that writ in an unsettled and unsatisfactory condition. For in the case first named the Queen's Bench laid it down that the duty for the performance of which the writ was claimed must be such as might be enforced by the prerogative writ; but, in the other case, the same Court appears to have, to a certain extent, repudiated that proposition.

With regard to the precise question involved in the present case it may be shortly stated thus. The declaration charged that the plaintiff being jointly liable with A. B. to pay a certain sum to the defendants, and the defendants having recovered judgment for such sum against A. B. and the plaintiff, and having issued execution thereon, the plaintiff paid the whole sum recovered; whereupon he became entitled to an assignment of the judgment against himself and A. B., which the defendants refused to give him. To this the defendants pleaded, in effect, that by the payment made by the plaintiff while in execution under a ca. sa. the judgment against himself and A. B. had become satisfied; and the plaintiff, by demurring to this plea and succeeding on it, established that this fact, even if true, was no answer to the action—in other words, that the plaintiff was entitled to have the judgment assigned, even if it were perfectly useless to him—for that against the enforcement of his statutory right to that effect, it was no sufficient argument that with respect to the judgment so assigned he might have, in one sense, to sue himself as a joint defendant.

LIABILITY OF INNKEEPERS, LAW AS TO.

Morgan v. Ravey, Exch., 9 W. R. 376.

The law as to the peculiar responsibility of innkeepers as bailees of the goods of their guests while sojourning with them, is well known and easily justified. They are held answerable for such goods if they are lost, damaged, or stolen, except only where they are taken from the traveller's own person, or by his own servant or companion, or by his own gross negligence; and the reason is that travellers are, from the necessity of the case, compelled to come to inns, and place confidence in persons who keep them, with whom they may have had no previous dealing or acquaintance. The defence to the present case was an attempt to qualify this common law doctrine by enabling the innkeeper by a notice to limit his responsibility, and to require his guests to use certain precautions themselves—as to fasten themselves into their bedrooms and to leave their more valuable property at the bar. This attempt was, however, unsuccessful. The Court was of opinion that, except in the cases above referred to, or in a loss arising from the act of God or the Queen's enemies, the innkeeper was liable, however he might seek to protect himself by a previous notice. The case of Dawson v. Chamney (5 Q. B. 168; 7 Jur. 1037) was, indeed, relied upon by the defendant as showing that, according to the opinion of the Queen's Bench, the question whether the negligence lay on the side of the innkeeper or the guest, was determinable in favour of the former if he could show to the satisfaction of a jury that he had taken all reasonable precautions for the security of the property entrusted to him. This case was commented on by the Court of Exchequer, and endeavoured to be distinguished in its circumstances from that before them. But it is evident that the barons were prepared, if necessary, to depart from the judgment delivered by Lord Denman, in so far as it might limit the responsibility of the innkeeper further than above mentioned.

PLEADING, RULES AS TO—EMBARRASSING PLEA, EFFECT OF.
Welland Railway Co. v. Blake, Exch., 9 W. R. 386.

This is an important exposition of the existing rules of pleading so far as they tend to prohibit an embarrassing plea; or, rather, it shows the proper construction of the 52nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, which allows a pleading so framed as "to prejudice, embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action" to be struck out or amended on the application of the opposite party.

The declaration charged the defendant with non-payment of certain calls authorised by, and made under, certain Acts of Parliament set forth therein; and the only plea placed by the defendant on the record was "never indebted." It was urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that this plea was "embarrassing," by reason of its putting them to an amount of expensive proof which would be unnecessary if the plea were confined to the denial of one or more allegations of fact in the declaration; but the Court replied that the plea of "never indebted" was a lawful one in an action arising on a simple contract, and that they had therefore no power to interfere. The Court added that they were of opinion that so far as the pleading rules of 1834 were not superseded by one or more of the pleading rules of Hilary Term, 1853, the former set of rules still subsisted in force. It is difficult, however, to understand how their express repeal in the preamble of the existing rules, is consistent with his view.

Correspondence.

"LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY."

Whilst the subject of education of attorneys and solicitors is being discussed, allow me to divert your attention for a while to sec. 2 of rule 1 of the above society, which is in these words, "Ordinary members, subscribers to the library or lectures of the Incorporated Law Society, clerks article to members of that society, and clerks who, having been article, are in the service of members of that society, shall be eligible for election as members of this society." And in addressing myself to this subject I may remark, en passant, that I think it would be more satisfactory and advantageous to the profession that the question whether, at the time of issuing the embryo rules regulating our examination, present or future article clerks should be bound to comply with, and be subject to them, should be settled with as little delay as possible, although I am quite willing to rest on my oars and abide the result of the combined deliberations of the Judges and the Incorporated Law Society; but after conning the subject "as worthy of cogitation," I cannot but think that only future students should be subject to future rules. And now as to the quoted rule of the Law Students' Debating Society I take exception to this rule on the ground that it imposes on an article clerk the necessity of being a subscriber either to the library or lectures of the Incorporated Law Society, or being article to, or in the service of, a member of that society. Why should I be compelled to pay for two articles when I only require one of them? And as to being a subscriber to the library or lectures, I do not object to the payment of the £1 a-year as being too much for either; but I would rather expend it in having a library of my own, as to that I can refer at all times. The advantages of attending lectures has been questioned; but before I venture to express myself on this, I wish to learn more, and probably you may be kind enough, as a friend, to open your columns to suggestions hereon, which may be not only beneficial to myself, but to others, if those competent to judge would be so kind as to impart to us their better knowledge. Why should my master be compelled to become a member against his inclination? He is well to do, and a highly respectable practitioner. Yet I would not so insult him as to ask such a favour, as, were he so disposed, he would require no mention of it. There is an old saying that "One volunteer is better than ten pressmen," and that infallible tutor "Experience" has taught us that is so. I presume not one of the members of the Debating Society would say theirs is so exclusive and select that those unfortunate ones of my situation are not select or respectable enough to be qualified to join them! Why, then, should we be treated so inconsiderately? One would imagine a society springing from the heart of our governing body, would have shown more liberality, and an anxiety rather to extend than limit their sphere of action among the rising generation of the profession. It is too exclusive and too arbitrary, as it should be open to every article clerk, whether article to a member of the Incorporated Law Society or not; and I hope the former may so relax their rules as to make all article clerks eligible to be elected members, and all paying the same uniform rate of subscription, whether increased or as at present. John Locke says, "To prejudge other men's notions before we have looked into them, is not to show their darkness, but to put out our own eyes." On this guiding principle I would wish to act with the Law Students' Debating Society, and in return should anticipate similar treatment from them. Doubtless Mr. Marmaduke Mathews, their secretary, may be able to furnish some argument or reason against my objections, or if mine are incorrect, I am open to correction, and shall with pleasure await its perusal. I object to assist in supporting one thing for the advantages I may receive from another. I would rather pay twice the amount towards the support of the one from which I derived benefit. I shall support the Incorporated Law Society as representing the profession; but I shall not, although I wish to, support the Law Students' Debating Society if I am compelled to subject myself to the objections to which I have alluded. No one more than myself would wish to see our profession raise itself to the highest standard in public estimation; and towards the realization of such an object, "most devoutly to be wished," my constant aim and endeavours will be applied. I should, however, disregard and sacrifice my own feelings were I not to make my opinions known, and I should think and acknowledge him a friend who would point out and advise me how to mend my faults. If you can find a nook for these few remarks, you would gratify, and probably do a service to others as well as, your faithful servant,

A LIMB OF THE LAW.

EXAMINERS' OFFICE IN CHANCERY.

It is a very common complaint among practitioners in Chancery that the progress of a cause to a hearing is delayed by reason of no appointment being procurable at the examiners' office for, say, six weeks after application is made for the purpose. I have often been inconvenienced in the manner pointed out, and as it appears to me that a simple remedy is at hand, I ask permission, through the medium of your columns, to suggest that junior barristers of, say, five years' standing, be allowed to act as examiners on signifying to the senior registrar of the court their willingness to act, and handing in their names to be placed on a list to be kept at the registrar's office. Two obvious advantages would result from this. One, to the solicitors, in being able at all times to make their own arrangements with their witnesses for the examination to take place irrespective of any particular appointed day, as is now the case; and the other, to the barristers in being early brought into business communication with solicitors. The examiners' remuneration could be adjusted on a moderate scale by the Lord Chancellor, and I doubt not that plenty of young men would become candidates for the post of examiner especially as so little legal knowledge is required to fill it. The simple difficulty of providing accommodation for the examination to take place in, cannot, surely, be insuperable. I trust that you will advocate such a change as I have suggested.

W. B.

Ireland.

At the quarter sessions for the county of Tipperary, held at Clonmel on the 5th instant, Mr. Serjeant Howley, assistant-barrister of the county, drew attention to the regulations made in pursuance of the Act passed in the session 23 & 24 Vict. c. 153, entitled "an Act to extend the law relating to the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland," which gives power (sec. 10) to the owners of land to make improvements thereon and (sec. 19) to charge the expenditure on such lands. The Act (sec. 25) also gives the owners of land power to grant building and other leases, under certain restrictions specified in the Act. The Act (sec. 36) also gives power to tenants to make improvements in the land occupied by them, and to charge the lands with the expenditure incurred thereby in manner in the Act expressed. He also alluded to an Act passed in the same session (cap. 154) entitled "an Act to consolidate and amend the law of landlord and tenant in Ireland," which enacts (amongst other things) that (sec. 8) leases may be renewed without surrender of under-tenancies; that (sec. 35) magistrates may issue precepts to restrain waste, that (sec. 4) actions for rent in arrear or (sec. 46) for use and occupation where the amount does not exceed £100, may be by Civil bill action in the court of the chairman of the county in which the lands are situate; and that (sec. 51) no distress shall be levied for more than one year's rent. For full particulars respecting the provisions of these important statutes, see ante, p. 9 and 30.

It has been stated that the sessional Crown solicitors have adopted a resolution to the effect that whenever vacancies occur in the office of assizes Crown solicitors, the Government should appoint the local Crown solicitors, with an increase of salary, to conduct the assizes business; and they state that this would effect a saving to the country of probably £1,200 per annum on each assize circuit.

THE SOLICITORS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

The Sixth General Meeting of this Association was held on Wednesday, the 17th of April last, at the Law Institution, Chancery-lane, to receive the half-yearly report, and to transact other business. The following announcement had been previously circulated amongst the members:—"The directors, feeling the importance of commencing the relieving operations of the association as early as possible, desire to have the views of the general body as to the minimum amount of invested capital which shall be considered sufficient to justify them in entertaining applications for relief." Members who could not attend the meeting were invited to communicate their opinions.

Mr. JAMES ANDERTON having taken the chair, the half-yearly report was read by Mr. Eiffe, the secretary, from which it appeared that since the last half-yearly meeting, 140 new members had joined the association, making the aggregate number now enrolled 1,020, of whom 388 were members for life, and 632 were annual subscribers.

The subscriptions, donations, and dividends on invested capital within the same period, had amounted to £648 19s. 4d., out of which a sum of £486 12s. 6d. had been added to the invested fund, making the entire invested capital at the present time £4,603 17s. 5d. £3 per cent. Consols; besides which, there was a cash balance of £198 8s. 6d. Since the last meeting, the expediency of selecting a more remunerative investment than Consols for the society's capital had been a subject of consideration with the board, who were pursuing inquiries to ascertain the most productive mode of investment compatible with safety. The directors stated that they had received applications for assistance during the past half-year, which they had found it painful to be unable to entertain, and requested an expression of the views of the meeting in the terms above mentioned. From the balance-sheet for the half-year it appeared that the working expenses amounted to £183 13s. 4d.

In moving that the report be adopted, the CHAIRMAN said, that although the directors in their report had expressed their satisfaction that the association had had an accession of 140 members since the last general meeting, he was not satisfied. He thought that looking at the numbers of the profession and the objects of that institution, they ought to have had a great many more (hear, hear), he regretted there was not more charity in the profession, especially when it had been said that charity covered a multitude of sins, he knew of no one who ought to be more ready to take advantage of that protection than the lawyers (hear, hear). The chairman proceeded to read a letter from Mr. Wasbrough of Bristol, stating that Mr. Heaven of Bristol, and himself, had been inviting several members of the profession in their neighbourhood to subscribe to the association, and as a result of their canvass he forwarded the names of eight annual and three life subscribers. Another letter was read from Mr. Morrell of Oxford, in which the writer stated he entirely concurred in the opinion that their capital ought to be largely increased before giving the assistance which it was the object of the society to give. Mr. Morrell added that feeling he had not been of much use hitherto as a director, he was willing to give £21 to assist the funds (hear, hear). The chairman observed that these letters were highly satisfactory. He recommended the directors to put their shoulders to the wheel during the next four months in order that when they came to meet at Worcester in the summer, they might be able to make a better report, and the society might then be in a situation to discuss the question of the distribution of its funds.

The motion was seconded by the deputy-chairman, Mr. Thomas Harrison, and carried; as was also a resolution expressing satisfaction at the progress of the society, which was moved by Mr. Stephen Williams, and seconded by Mr. C. Hall. A vote of thanks to Mr. Anderton, for his exertions in saving the association from expense by allowing them the free use of rooms at his chambers as offices, was moved by Mr. Benham, and seconded by Mr. Banner, and carried unanimously. A resolution of thanks to the directors was then put and carried, having been moved by Mr. Redpath, and seconded by Mr. Hart.

The question as to the investment of the capital of the association was then submitted to the meeting by Mr. C. A. Smith, who was followed by Mr. Torr, Mr. Stephen Williams, Mr. Banner, Mr. Henry Kimber, Mr. Redpath, and other speakers; but no resolution was moved, and the subject was postponed to a future occasion.

Mr. GIRAUD then moved the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of this meeting it is not expedient to commence granting relief until the funds of the society amount to £10,000." He observed that at present the expenses of the association exceeded 25 per cent. of their income.

Mr. STEPHEN WILLIAMS seconded the motion. He thought the institution would be incurring great expense if they began distributing alms whilst they were still in an infant state of existence.

Mr. TORR asked whether, in the event of the meeting being of opinion that the association should commence operations at once, if they were to put two or three annuitants on the list, and no personal applications were to be entertained, the chairman would still be willing to give them the advantage of having offices at his house as before?

The CHAIRMAN said he should be willing to continue to the association the use of his chambers until the business of the society became so large as to become a nuisance to him.

Mr. BANNER moved an amendment to the resolution. He said that in canvassing for the society, he was every day met with the objection—"You have been accumulating money now for two or three years, and you do nothing with it." If the association began giving relief, they would certainly get many more subscribers. That, at any rate, was the feeling at Birmingham, Hull, York, and elsewhere in the country. He contended that no increase of expenditure was to be anticipated, as all applications must be by letter, and would be answered by the secretary.

Mr. C. HALL seconded the amendment.

Mr. BENHAM opposed the amendment. He asked how the society could possibly do anything till it was supplied with funds? He thought an attempt should be made to raise a supply fund for expenses by donations and alms, so as to leave one fund free from any charge whatever.

The CHAIRMAN said that a circular had been sent round to all the members, asking for their opinion on this matter. To this inquiry twenty-two replies were returned. Six were in favour of the view that there should be £10,000 invested before any distribution took place; five thought that sums from £5,000 to £8,000 should be first invested; five were against commencing relief in the present state of the funds; five wished to commence giving relief at once; and one was neutral.

Mr. YOUNG said his opinion was against the amendment. It was surely speculative how long they might possess their present income. Whatever assistance the Chairman might now be giving them, he might any day want to re-occupy his rooms. He did not think the society's donations fell short in consequence of their not yet giving any assistance.

Mr. HARRISON said he had given this subject much consideration. He thought that if this amendment were carried, the meeting would be sowing the seeds of an early dissolution of the society. Several of the members, who had also been members of the old society which was confined to London and its neighbourhood, must remember that that was a successful and well-conducted institution; and they came to the conclusion that it would not be safe to distribute their funds until they had £10,000 invested. The present association, with its extended area, ought to be possessed of £40,000 or £50,000. The Chairman might some day find his convenience too seriously invaded by the occupation of his rooms. Their expenses already were some £120 or £130 out of an income of £200; and those expenses were increasing. To meet these they were dependent upon casual annual subscriptions.

Mr. GIRAUD condemned the expensive working of the association.

Mr. H. KIMBER (one of the auditors) explained the grounds why the sum of £10,000 had been fixed upon.

Mr. REDPATH thought it would be most unwise to grant relief in the shape of five or six annuities, and then to be compelled to stop. The practice of the Governesses Society was never to grant an annuity unless they were able to invest it. Something, he thought, might be done to curtail the expenses.

Mr. C. A. SMITH observed that the objection to the society was, that they were only scraping money together. He thought it would be equally to the advantage of the poor and of the society to be doing something.

Mr. MACKRELL deprecated the expensive working of the society. He thought something might be done at once towards applying part of the society's income to the wants of their necessitous brethren.

Mr. SIDNEY SMITH, jun., supported Mr. Banner's amendment. He thought, however, the extent of the relief should be limited to the income of the invested capital, and should be confined to members and their families.

Mr. MACKENZIE said that if the question were one of whether they should distribute or should not, he was in favour of the more liberal course being taken.

Mr. COOKSON said he might, perhaps, be permitted to observe that the impression of the trustees was very strong that the relief of members should be the primary consideration, and that others should be assisted only out of their abundance. The association might be considered in the light of a mutual benefit society, whereby members might contribute to each other's relief, as they could not anticipate the reverses which might fall upon any one of themselves. He thought they would not be justified in extending relief to non-members, until a larger amount was contributed than they possessed at present.

The resolution was then put and negatived, and the following amendment was carried:—"That in the opinion of this meeting, the directors should commence granting relief immediately to members and their families; the extent of such relief not exceeding the income of the invested capital of the association."

The CHAIRMAN then moved that the thanks of the meeting be presented to the Incorporated Law Society for the use of their rooms free of expense. This was seconded by Mr. C. A. Smith, and carried; and with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the proceedings terminated.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE FOURTEENTH ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING OF THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION, HELD AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY'S HALL, ON WEDNESDAY, APRIL 17TH, 1861.

Mr. THOMAS KENNEDY in the chair.

The SECRETARY read the report and annual balance-sheet.

Resolved—4. On the motion of Mr. TORR; seconded by Mr. BENHAM: That the best thanks of the association be presented to Mr. C. A. Smith and Mr. J. Morris for their services as auditors, and that they be requested to accept the same office for the ensuing year.

Resolved—5. On the motion of Mr. RAWLINS, of Birmingham; seconded by Mr. TORR: That the best thanks of the association be presented to the Council of the Incorporated Law Society for their courtesy in lending one of their rooms for the purposes of the meeting.

Resolved—6. On the motion of Mr. ROSE; seconded by Mr. T. H. BOWER: That the best thanks of the meeting be presented to Mr. Kennedy, for his able conduct in the chair.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Secretary, which was moved by the CHAIRMAN and seconded by Mr. TORR.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

We have received the last quarterly report of the Law Students' Debating Society. It is as follows:—

Gentlemen,—In reporting to you the proceedings of the society during the past quarter, I will pursue the course which has generally been taken, and notice the principal events that have occurred, and give a résumé of those matters which seem to me to call for remark during that period. There are some matters in connection with the support and progress of the society which I will venture to suggest, and to which I beg the consideration of members individually,—I mean their attendance at our meetings, and the avoidance of motions which take up much time without leading to beneficial results. We have held 12 meetings during the past quarter, at which 7 legal and 4 jurisprudential questions have been discussed. The average attendance of members has been 25 at each meeting, while that of the number of speakers has been more than 9, and those who have recorded their votes in the book kept for the purpose, and also at the conclusion of the debate very nearly 12. The time occupied by the proceedings shews an average of close upon 2 hours. A larger result might have been expected having regard to the interesting nature of the questions and to the fact that more than 20 new members have been elected since October; but it should be remembered that the debate on the legal question proposed for the first meeting was adjourned, so that these statistics may at least be considered as satisfactory. At the first meeting in January, on the announcement of Mr. Plaskitt's resignation as committee-man, a vote of thanks was passed for the very efficient manner in which he had discharged the duties of that office; and Mr. Dowse was subsequently elected to supply the vacancy. A resolution was also carried which virtually has the effect of repealing part of rule 12, viz., that no member of this society, other than the opener of the debate, shall in future be permitted to speak on any question for a longer period than 20 minutes, the time allowed for speaking having been previously fixed at half an hour. In February a motion for calling on the debate on the legal question not later than eight o'clock, and a proposed amendment of rule 5, were negatived by the society. The following addition has been made to the rules, viz.—“That any member desirous of withdrawing from the society should signify his intention in writing to the secretary, who should thereupon enter such resignation in the books of the society.” I am happy to say that 9 new members have been elected during the quarter, making a total of 23 during the half-year. However, unless cause be shown to the contrary, it will become necessary to strike off the list the names of 7 gentlemen for non-payment of fines and subscriptions; these have been written to on the subject. I have also to report that six gentlemen have resigned. The thanks of the society were recently voted to Mr. Edward Lawrance, jun., for his having presented it with his “Handy Book on the Law of Principal and Surety,” and those who have looked through its pages will, I have no doubt, think it shows promise that Mr. Lawrance will one day be found among our most read and most readable legal authors. One of our members obtained a prize given by the Incorporated Law Society at the Hilary examination. Your committee have met twice, and carefully examined 12 questions, 6 of which, after lengthened discussion, were approved, and have appeared in the papers. They have also chosen those questions of a jurisprudential character which were considered most beneficial for the society to discuss, and in which the members would feel the greatest interest; but I must again urge most strongly upon all members the necessity of not neglecting the important essential of affording assistance to your committee in providing questions appropriate for discussion, as this difficulty was never more seriously felt than at the present time. It is also to be remembered that all members owe a duty to the society, which is to attend and take an active part in the debate as often as they possibly can; and although it may be extremely praiseworthy of gentlemen to devote a great portion of their time to the evening drills of their respective volunteer corps, yet the claims of this society are not the less important, affording as it does an arena for gentlemen to exercise their powers of thought, and by practice obtain command of language, at the same time providing a beneficial recreation to those whose thoughts are absorbed by private study, while it does not lead the mind away from those legal subjects that engross its attention. It is therefore to be hoped that the society will not so often find that members, and more particularly the old members, are engaged, or unable to attend on Tuesday evenings. It is also very desirable that gentlemen would make it convenient to stay to hear the president's summing up, as a pre-entertained opinion may sometimes be varied, and the judgment led to a more correct determination. The number of speakers would then, I venture to think, be very materially increased by insuring to every one an attentive hearing. Every well organized society must have some ruling and governing head whose duty it is to provide for its wants, and he always ready to give its best advice for the welfare of the society upon matters submitted to it. And I cannot help thinking that it would be better if gentlemen who bring on motions would previously endeavour to ascertain, by having discussed the merits of the motion with some friend, whether they will meet with the general approval of the society, or at least, be provided with a seconder; and not leave it entirely to chance, or to a sort of taken-for-granted love of litigious argument and discussion in a body of lawyers.

I beg to remain, gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
GEO. L. WINGATE.

HINTS TO ARTICLED CLERKS.

No. III.

HIS COURSE OF PROFESSIONAL READING.

We now proceed, following up the plan sketched out at the commencement of these papers, to give some hints to the articulated clerk as to the course of professional reading which he should pursue. There are two dissimilar mistakes into either of which a young man may fall, and either of which may be almost equally prejudicial. He may skim over the pages of a law book in much the same way as he would read a novel or a newspaper; or he may waste his time and energies and exhaust his patience by acting upon a resolute determination to leave behind him no subject which he has not thoroughly mastered. We know that the latter course has indeed often been recommended, but it has always seemed to us that if the student endeavours to act upon it, he must soon become disheartened. In the course of his reading he will meet with many propositions and illustrations which after the fullest consideration he can then give to them, will still appear misty and obscure. The author may have expressed himself unhappily, or his subject may be unusually crabbed and intricate. If our student resolves to halt in his course until he has completely cleared up his doubts, he will probably never advance a step further; and the wiser plan is, after devoting a reasonable amount of time and thought to the difficulty, and finding himself after all unable to solve it, to proceed, hoping in the words of Lord Coke, that “on some other day, at some other place, his doubts will be removed.” Many of our readers must remember that in the course of their school or college life, difficulties have occurred to them in their classical or mathematical studies which seemed and actually were insuperable at the time, which they might have hammered at for hours without success, but which a few weeks or months afterwards seemed perfectly clear. And this subsequent enlightenment has arisen, not always from the fact of the acquisition of further knowledge, but from the mind coming fresh to the subject.

As to the particular time of the day which the clerk will take for his reading, or the number of hours which he will devote to it, no precise rules are pretended to be given. Much must depend upon opportunity, much upon duty, and in the case of a diligent student, something upon inclination. If the clerk is articulated in an office where the practice is large, he will find that there must necessarily be considerable breaks in his course of reading; although we should advise him, except under very extraordinary circumstances, always to steal an hour each day for his books. Probably two, or at the most three, hours a day will be all that he will be able to devote to a regular course of study; and we can assure him that if he studies diligently for two hours out of the twenty-four, he will at the end of his clerkship, be in possession of a very large amount of legal information. He will not, indeed, be an accomplished lawyer, but he will have laid the foundation for becoming such. Those who advise the articulated clerk to study for five or six hours a day can know but little of the material of which articulated clerks are made, or of the calls upon their time arising from office work. When once the clerk has resolved upon reading, and has begun to read, any particular book, he ought not on any account to be diverted from it to another before he has finished the first. Desultory, incomplete reading is a bad habit in itself, but it is utterly fatal in the study of law; first, because a student who so reads, acquires a complete knowledge of no single subject, and secondly, because law, both in its study and in its practice, imperatively demands concentrated attention.

With these hints as to the mode of reading law, to which we must add the time-honoured maxim, non multa sed multum, as one always to be borne in mind by the law student, we proceed to suggest such a course of reading as seems to us best adapted for enabling the articulated clerk not merely to pass his examination with credit, but to lay deep and wide the foundations of future knowledge, to be acquired after the termination of his clerkship. The law student's first book continues to be one of the modern editions of Blackstone's Commentaries, or the New Commentaries of Mr. Serjt. Stephen, built upon Mr. Justice Blackstone's celebrated work. The New Commentaries are written in an interesting style, and may be thoroughly depended upon as containing an accurate, although necessarily concise, statement of the whole body of modern English law. Mr. Kerr's edition of Blackstone is also a useful book; but the student may take Serjt. Stephen as his first teacher with the greatest confidence. Serjt. Stephen appears to us to have arranged his work more philosophically, and to be as graceful a writer as his great master; while Mr. Kerr presents his well packed volumes to the legal public at a price which when contrasted with that of other law books, including that of Serjt. Stephen's, is exceedingly moderate—a consideration not without weight to most articulated clerks. Blackstone should be read in the first instance very carefully, but right through, and without paying more or less attention to one part of the work than to the other. The reader will thus acquire a general view of the subject upon which he is entering, and will possess an outline plan of English law which it will be the work of after years to fill up and render distinct and practical. In order, however, to make this his first perusal of a law book, as advantageous as possible, and to impress upon his mind its most salient points, we should advise him to examine himself from time to time by the aid of Mr. James Stephen's Questions on the Commentaries, which, although compiled with special reference to the New Commentaries, may still be used by the reader of Kerr's Blackstone. By thus questioning himself as he proceeds, he will render his knowledge precise, sharp, and definite, will see how far his attention has been kept alive during his reading, and will learn how far he really understands the words over which his eye has passed.

After a general view of English law has thus been gained, the student will from his reading, and from the course of practice in the office, have learned that the subjects which mainly occupy the attorney's attention are:—1, Conveyancing (Rights of Things or Rights of Property); 2, Common Law; 3, Equity (Private Wrongs or Civil Injuries); 4, Criminal Law (Public Wrongs). Now, the attorney can hardly commence practice with satisfaction to himself or with a reasonable hope of doing justice to his clients, unless he has a knowledge of the principles and practice of each of these departments of our law. It is not, indeed, necessary that his knowledge of them should be extensive; but, so far as it goes, it should be precise, clear, and accurate. When he is once fairly launched in practice, it is most likely that he will find his attention pretty much confined to one or two of these departments; and when this is the case, the course of his future studies must be decided by his practice. But at the commencement of his career as a clerk, he cannot tell how his future course may shape itself; and he ought therefore, when he is first admitted, to possess such an amount of general knowledge as may enable him to acquit himself without discredit in any department in which his first essays may be made. The following suggestions as to books to be read are framed with a view to these considerations.

A knowledge of the law of property and conveyancing lies at the very foundation of all other legal studies; and we therefore advise the articled clerk to commence here by again reading the Second Book—"Of Rights of Property"—in the New Commentaries, or the analogous portion of Kerr's Blackstone, working it well into, and making it, as it were, a part of his mind. He read it before for the sake of getting a general view, but now he must leave no corner unexplored, and he should not finally lay it down, until he is satisfied that he could pass a very rigid examination in it. This should be followed by Mr. Joshua Williams' books on Real and Personal Property. They should be studied in the same way, and when they have been thoroughly mastered, the reader will find himself possessed of a very fair knowledge of property law, a foundation upon which hereafter, if occasion should arise, a very stately superstructure may be raised. Unless, however, the articled clerk should be quite sure that his practice as an attorney will be almost exclusively confined to conveyancing, we do not advise him to pursue his formal study of that subject any further during his clerkship. We say "formal study" because we do not by any means wish to deter our readers, but would rather urge them when any point of difficulty occurs in practice, which may not be solved by the help of the books we have mentioned, to hunt it down in any treatises to which they may have access. So also if they should be framing a draft with the help of Davidson or Jar. Byth., a perusal of the notes appended to their forms by those authors will often be of very great practical advantage.

The course of reading on common law may be commenced by again perusing so much of the New Commentaries as treats of Civil Injuries, or the analogous portion of Kerr's Blackstone, excluding so much as relates to Civil Injuries cognizable in courts of equity. This should be followed up by reading Mr. Prentice's edition of Smith's Action at Law, and Smith on Contracts. The articled clerk may, however, if he pleases, substitute for the works we have mentioned on the Action at Law and Contracts, Broom's Commentaries on the Common Law, which is the only book containing a complete synopsis of the principles and practice of our common law, digested and arranged for the use of students. Regarded as a scientific work it is perhaps defective, but we speak from experience when we say that it is readable and instructive. The only other work in the department of common law which we recommend to be read during clerkship is Best on Evidence, which is certainly a better student's book than even Mr. Taylor's, admirable as the latter work is and indeed indispensable to the practising lawyer.

Equity may be studied from that part of the New Commentaries which treats of Civil Injuries cognizable in courts of equity, from Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence, —and from Ayckbourn's Chancery Practice. Mr. Smith's Manual is an admirable work, although it is so much condensed that the articled clerk will find that it requires the closest attention and repeated reading in order that its learning may be thoroughly impressed upon his mind.

Criminal law should be read from the New Commentaries, from Broom's Commentaries, and from Jervis' Archbold's Pleading and Evidence in Criminal Cases edited by Welsby. The last named book, invaluable as it is to the practitioner, is wretchedly dry reading; and we do not therefore advise the student to read it through, but to content himself by mastering the whole of Book I. and so much of Book II. as relates to the offences of most ordinary occurrence, particularly simple larceny, false pretences and embezzlement.

There are divers heads of law upon which we have not touched, such as Poor Law, Summary Convictions and Orders, Bankruptcy, Election Law, and Divorce. These subjects can hardly be read systematically during clerkship; but whereas business arises in the practice of the office, which is referable to any of these heads, the clerk will do well to refer to some book on the subject, and so pick up what information he can concerning them.

It will, no doubt, appear to all our readers that the course which we have suggested comprises very few books, and that many standard works are omitted from it. We have been desirous, however, not to suggest a complete course of legal study, but only a course to be pursued during clerkship. The clerk must not think that when he has once been admitted his reading is to cease. The young attorney ought, besides reading the reports, always to have some standard book in hand relating to that branch of the profession in which he may find himself most generally occupied. He will then be able to carry on and to complete, so far as education can be completed, that course of study which he in fact only commenced during his articles. It will, too, we hope, have been sufficiently apparent from what has been said before, that the books mentioned are not to be read hastily, but as if the student was preparing for a school or college examination in them. He should feel when he takes his leave of each volume that he is thoroughly well up in it, that he has exhausted its information, and that he can learn nothing more from it. In a word, the books we have recommended are not merely to be read, but to be studied.

MAYFIELD, SUSSEX.

A compact and valuable Freehold Farm, most eligibly situated in the parish of Mayfield, in the beautiful vicinity of Tunbridge-wells, comprising about 308 acres of arable, pasture, meadow, hop, and wood land, free of great tithes and land-tax redeemed, offering an eligible opportunity for investment or for occupation if desired.

MR. MARSH has received instructions to SELL by AUCTION, at the MART, in JUNE next (unless previously disposed of by private contract), a valuable FREEHOLD ESTATE, distinguished as Pennybridge Farm, situated in the parish of Mayfield, within eight miles of Tunbridge-wells, and five miles from the Wadhurst Station on the Tunbridge-wells and Hastings Railway. It consists of a convenient farmhouse, with all requisite agricultural buildings, in a good state of repair, and about 208 acres of land, of which about 8 acres are hop garden, 25 acres of woodland (affording abundant cover for game), and the remainder arable and pasture. In the occupation of Mr. James Stevenson (who and whose father have in succession occupied the property for the last 50 years), at a net rental of £170 per annum. The lessee pays all rates, taxes, and charges and repairs.

The property may be viewed on application to the tenant, who will show the estate, of whom particulars and conditions of sale, with plans, may be obtained; also of H. G. BRYDONE, Esq., Petworth; of T. D. CALTHROP, Esq., Solicitor, 8, Whitehall-place, S.W.; at the Sussex and Kentish Hotels, Tunbridge-wells; at the hotels at Lewes and Hastings; at the Mart; and at Mr. MARSH'S offices, Charlotte-row, Mansion-house, London.

STAFFORDSHIRE.

Valuable Building Land, in the borough of Wolverhampton; also very desirable Building Sites, Lands, Dwelling-houses, and Cottages, in the parishes of Trysil and Wombourne.

MR. THOMAS LLOYD begs to announce that he has received instructions to offer for SALE by PUBLIC AUCTION, at the SWAN HOTEL, WOLVERHAMPTON, in the early part of the month of MAY, in lots, about nine acres of extremely valuable FREEHOLD BUILDING LAND, situated at Chapel Ash, in the borough of Wolverhampton; also several excellent plots of freehold land, admirably adapted for building purposes, commanding beautiful views of the surrounding country: arable and meadow land, dwelling-houses, cottages, and premises, containing altogether upwards of 100 acres of land, situated in the parish of Trysil, and in the liberty of Orton, in the parish of Wombourne, above five miles from Wolverhampton.

Full particulars will be announced in future advertisements, and in the meantime inquiries may be made of Messrs. BARKER, BOWKER, & PEAKE, Solicitors, Gray's-inn-square, London; and of the Auctioneer, Darlington-street, Wolverhampton.

THAMES-STREET AND BISHOPSGATE-STREET.

Valuable Freehold Estates, comprising the King's Arms Publichouse, Lower Thames-street, and a commanding Shop and Warehouse, Bishopsgate-street without, producing £253 per annum.

MESSRS. FAREBROTHER, CLARK, and LYE have received instructions to SELL, at GARRAWAY'S, on WEDNESDAY, MAY 1, at TWELVE, a valuable FREEHOLD ESTATE, comprising that well-known publichouse, the King's Arms, situate No. 61, Lower Thames-street, and 11, Water-lane, leased to Messrs. Courage, Brewers, for a term of 14 years from the 29th September, 1852, leaving only 5½ unexpired, at the low rent of £190 per annum, and a capital and commanding shop and premises, with large warehouse in the rear, situate No. 83, Bishopsgate-street Without, let on lease to Mr. John Toede, Grocer, for 14 years from Lady-day, 1856, at a rental of, for the first seven years, £95, the remainder at £100 per annum.

To be viewed by permission of the tenants, and particulars had of F. N. DEVEY, Esq., No. 34, Ely-place, Holborn, E.C.; at Garraway's, E.C.; and of Messrs. FAREBROTHER, CLARK, and LYE, 6, Lancaster-place, Strand, W.C.

CHARING-CROSS HOSPITAL, West Strand.—

This Charity has now entered the 45th year of its existence, and the Governors indulge the hope that its operations will always be found worthy of adequate support.

Its exertions comprehend the relief annually of from 16,000 to 17,000 sick and disabled poor, including 3,000 cases of accident (many of great severity and danger), and constant accommodation for upwards of 100 in-patients in the wards. The annual cost is about £3,000. The following contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

G. F. Heneage, Esq. £10 10 0 | Mrs. E. C., add £50 0 0
Mrs. F. C., add 50 0 0 | H. Cunliffe, Esq. 40 0 0

CHILDREN'S WARDS.

To render the Hospital still more efficient, the Council are anxious to bring into useful operation the Wards for Children, hitherto unoccupied for want of funds; a measure which alone remains to complete the designs of the founders. It has been estimated that the addition of £330 annually to the income of the Hospital would suffice for its accomplishment, an addition which it is earnestly hoped public benevolence will supply.

A generous benefactor has commenced a subscription for the purpose by a donation of £500, to which the following liberal contributions have been added, and the Council anxiously solicit the assistance of other supporters to the good work.

W. Stuart, Esq. £500 0 0	R. Few, Esq. £100 0 0
Dr. Golding 10 10 0	Ditto 2 0 0
J. Greenwood, Esq. 5 5 0	J. Wilkinson, Esq. 5 5 0
H. Wainman, Esq. 50 0 0	Ditto 1 1 0
T. Tison, Esq. 20 0 0	Charles Few, Esq. 50 0 0
Rev. R. H. Cooper 3 0 0	James Parker, Esq. 10 10 0
R. Cobbett, Esq. 10 10 0	Surplus of Subscription
Ditto 1 1 0	for a Testimonial to
E. Wilder, Esq. 10 10 0	Dr. Golding and Mr.
Lord Egerton of Tatton 50 0 0	Robertson 60 12 0

ENDOWMENT FUND.

To ensure the permanence of the useful objects of the Hospital, and to assist in providing against the serious losses which it sustains with painful frequency by the death of kind supporters, a Permanent Endowment Fund has been established, which, when further promoted by benefactions or bequests, will afford some steady source of income, in addition to that arising from casual and therefore uncertain subscriptions. The dividends from this source will substantially assist the regular disbursements of the Hospital, while the invested principal will be held intact and inviolate.

Very valuable assistance has been rendered by the legacies of deceased benefactors, and as upon this source the continued welfare of the Hospital must in great part depend, it may be respectfully stated to those benefactors who may be desirous to endow, by benefaction or bequest, a ward, or one or more beds, to bear in perpetuity the name of the donor, or of one whose memory he cherishes and would wish to identify with a permanent work of charity, that such desire can be fulfilled in accordance with the regulations of this Hospital.

The following additional contributions are thankfully acknowledged:—

Thomas Raymond Barker, Esq., add., £35,	The Rev. A. Clissold, £50 0 0
making up £100 0 0	Messrs. Gale & Co. add. 5 5 0
	Messrs. Cox & Co. 100 0 0

Donations for the current objects of the Hospital, or for the Children's Wards, or the Endowment Fund, will be thankfully received by the Secretary, at the Hospital; and by Messrs. Coutts, Messrs. Drummonds, Messrs. Hoare, and Messrs. Herries; and through all the principal bankers.

SIR W. BURNETT, Director-General of the Medical Department of the Navy, recommended BORWICK'S BAKING POWDER in preference to every other, for the use of her Majesty's Navy, because it was more wholesome—more effective—would keep longer—and was in all respects superior to every other manufactured. Pleading testimonials as to its superior excellence have also been received from the Queen's Private Baker; Dr. Hassall, Analyst to the Lancet; Captain Allen Young, of the Arctic yacht "Fox," and other scientific men. Sold everywhere in 1d., 2d., 4d., and 6d. packets; and 1s., 2s. 6d., and 5s. boxes.

When you ask for Borwick's Baking Powder, see that you get it, as complaints have been made of shopkeepers substituting worthless articles, made from inferior and inexpensive ingredients, because they are realising a larger profit by them.

CURRENT TOPICS.

A clause introduced into the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, now before the House of Lords, and passed by the House of Commons without comment, requires more attention than it has hitherto to all appearance received. We refer to the 86th clause of the Bill as amended, which is as follows:—

"Wherever the goods and chattels of a debtor are sold under an execution upon any judgment recovered in any action or suit brought for the recovery of a debt, money demand, or damages against any debtor, such goods and chattels shall in all cases be sold by the sheriff by public auction, and not by bill of sale or private contract, and such sale shall be publicly advertised by the sheriff on and during three days next preceding the day of sale."

The subject of this clause is one with which few members of the Legislature, legal or otherwise, are familiar, which circumstance may probably account for the silence under which it was passed; but by the majority of solicitors its operation will be sufficiently understood, and we therefore invite their serious attention to it. It appears to us that the clause if passed would produce much inconvenience and loss to both debtor and creditor, without any adequate advantage to either. We will illustrate our meaning by putting the following simple instances which may have, probably, occurred to some of our readers.

There are many clergymen, small landed proprietors, or traders living in remote parts of the country, who have, by marriage, bequest, or otherwise, become proprietors of shares in banking or trading companies, and thereby exposed themselves in case of the failure of such companies, at least in the first instance, to heavy personal liability. There is in such cases nothing to prevent a judgment being entered up and execution issued against such a person for an amount exceeding his ability to pay, and as a consequence of such execution his furniture may be seized by the sheriff. It frequently happens that the pressure is only temporary, and that there is a prospect of the difficulties being surmounted. In such a case, as the law is at present, it is a common thing for a third party to intervene and purchase the goods or furniture from the sheriff at their full value, so as to retain them in their existing state until a settlement can be arrived at. The creditor thus gets the full value of the property he has seized, and the debtor gets the advantage of a reasonable time to prevent his house from being dismantled, and his stock-in-trade or other effects lost and dispersed, and probably sold at an undervalue. But if the clause in question becomes law, these arrangements, which are of frequent occurrence, can no longer take place, and the sheriff will be bound to realise the value of the goods by public auction. Either, therefore, the debtor must pay the whole debt, which he may be unable to do, or he must submit to have his establishment broken up. The proceeds of furniture or stock-in-trade when sold by auction are in most cases much less than their value to the owner, and generally the owner is, from the circumstance of his station in society, or of his trading connexions, or from personal feelings, willing to pay or secure much more than the intrinsic value of his goods, if allowed to retain them: but the clause in question is imperative; when once the goods have passed into the hands of the sheriff, they must be dispersed and sold, unless the sheriff is willing to take upon himself the responsibility of violating the statute. There appears no good reason why that this clause, which is in no way connected with procedure in bankruptcy or insolvency, but rather with the general law of debtor and creditor, should be inserted in its present place, and its omission would in no way interfere with the operation of the measure. But as it has already passed the Commons it is important to consider its probable operation; and we think it advisable to call the attention of our readers to the subject.

We are indebted to a learned correspondent for the following remarks upon some features in the Attorney-General's Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, which do not recommend the Bill to lawyers:—

I beg leave to draw attention to the following points:—

In the Bill there are sections	246
By reference to schedule G, and the Acts therein specified, it will be seen that the following sections of Acts are retained:—
Of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110	22
Of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96	26
Of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 102	1
Of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106 (unless they can be shown to be inconsistent with the proposed Act)	210
Of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 77	13
Of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 119	16

Total 534

In order, therefore, to construe the Bill, consideration must be given to 534 sections, without reference to any other statutes, and parts of statutes, which have not been repealed; see particularly the schedule to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106. By the 7th & 8th Vict. c. 96, s. 74, and the 12th & 13th Vict. c. 106, s. 1, and the 24th section of the new Bill, and schedule G (by which the repeal of certain Acts, or parts of Acts, has been, or is intended to be, effected), the repeal is not express but by enactment that certain statutes, or parts of statutes, inconsistent with particular statutes, or parts of statutes, shall be repealed. It is plain that by such a course of legislation there is an impossibility of arriving at any definite conclusion as to the meaning of the Legislature. The Lord Chancellor, speaking in the House of Lords, on the 28th of February last, on the Statute Law Revision Bill, said, "No lawyer, however laborious had been his studies, could take upon himself to state what statutes were now in force, and what had been repealed, particularly after the vicious mode of passing Acts of Parliament by which statutes were repealed, not expressly, but by simply enacting that all statutes inconsistent with that particular Act should be repealed. The difficulty, of course, was to decide what statutes were inconsistent with it."—Hansard, vol. 161, p. 1058. The House of Commons, with a laugh, received the information given to them by the Attorney-General on the 11th of February last on introducing the Bill, that it was less by one-half than the Bill of last session; but if the result shall be the necessity of reference to 534 sections of Acts of Parliament, and to other Acts relating to the subject which have not been repealed, although the members of the House of Commons may laugh at being relieved from considering a long bill, the people will have to contend against great length, and, according to the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, almost insuperable difficulty of construction from the vicious mode of repeal I have mentioned. It should be remembered that the House of Commons have had, according to the views of the Attorney-General, their way against his judgment, which he stated he had surrendered, his sentiments and feelings being in favour of a consolidating measure; see his speech on the 11th of February last.

In the personal history of Lord Bacon, p. 34, is the following:—"Bacon tells a house full of Queen's serjeants and utter barristers that the laws are made to guard the rights of the people, not to feed the lawyers. The laws should be read by all, known to all. Put them into shape, inform them with philosophy, reduce them in bulk, give them into every man's hand." I commend this passage to those of our legislators who undertake the amendment of our bankruptcy laws.

The Saturday Review of last week contains a sensible and well-timed article upon the subject of the appointment of recorders, which was suggested by the recent vacancies at Leeds and Brighton. We extract the following observations:—

Recorderships are given as a field of trial and as a step in promotion to men of two sorts. There are many barristers who become first notorious, and then famous, by doing a rather inferior and questionable style of business—who are supposed to be somehow not exactly on the square—who are, perhaps, burdened with debt, have their paper in the market, and are at the mercy of merciless creditors; or who have in some way compromised their reputation and are rather shunned, although no one has any definite charge to adduce against them. Such men are often possessed of real ability, and even if their gifts are not of a high kind, yet they know how, by the arts of pleasing or annoying, to make themselves felt by those who have a voice in the distribution of good things. When recorderships are given to such men, an opportunity is secured of observing how they really stand in the estimation of the public and the profession. There is enough of the judicial dignity attaching to the office to make an appointment in some degree serve as a certificate of judicial capability; and yet there is no great harm done, nor does any great scandal ensue, if the recorder, instead of showing that he is more nearly fit for the bench than was thought, only enhances his previous bad reputation, and sinks lower and lower. It is only a kind of mimic judgeship that is being degraded by its holder. Sometimes, also, the office is conferred on young men who promise to rise to greater things, and who have impressed some influential person with a sense of their power of mind, application, and fitness to administer criminal law. It is not very often that appointments are made in this way, as the young recorder must ordinarily have done something more than inspire a good opinion of himself, and must have enjoyed an opportunity of rendering some service that has brought him under the special notice of a powerful friend; and the occurrence of such an opportunity is necessarily fortuitous. But when it so happens that such a man has the opportunity, and profits by it, to get a recordership early in his career, the appointment is at once a great encouragement to the individual and beneficial to the public. The actual experience of a judge's work is a rich source of instruction to a rising barrister, and acts as a check on the meaner passions and coarser feelings apt to prevail in criminal courts; and everything which tends to raise the character of the bar is a public benefit. If they did nothing else recorderships would be very useful as permitting those entrusted with the appointment occasionally to give men of doubtful position a new chance of respectability, and to encourage, and at the same time in some small degree improve, men of promise while still struggling with the difficulties that encompass a man who holds the humble position of a sessions junior. Recorderships serve, it must be owned, a much higher purpose when they are offered to such men as Mr. Ellis. The English bar derives much of its reputation from numbering in its ranks men who only attain moderate professional success, but who are known widely beyond the limits of their profession.

The manner in which the minor judicial patronage of the Government is distributed concerns the public even more than the legal profession. On a former occasion we felt called upon to offer some criticism upon the appointment to some vacant recorderships of gentlemen who had no other claim or qualification for the office of recorder than aristocratic and powerful connections. Mr. Henry Wyndham West, of the Northern Circuit, and of the West Riding, Yorkshire, and Leeds Borough Sessions, has within the present week been appointed to the Attorney-Generalship of the Duchy of Lancaster, an office which has been rendered vacant by the lamented death of Mr. Flower Ellis, a very learned and able lawyer and accomplished gentleman. Now we know nothing whatever of Mr. West, except what we learn from the Law List, and from a contemporary which is devoted to the interests of city companies, and delights in chronicling the honours attained by the liverymen of the city. The City Press informs us that Mr. West has been for some years a revising barrister for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and that he is also recorder of Scarborough, and junior counsel to the Admiralty. These three appointments might well have been considered a fair allowance for gentleman who was called to the Bar only in 1848, and who has never, either upon circuit or by his contributions to legal literature, made himself a name which is much known in the profession. At all events it is not strange that the nomination of Mr. West as Attorney-General for the Duchy of Lancaster should cause some surprise on a circuit numbering nearly 200 members, the majority of whom may fairly be supposed to possess personal qualifications for the office equal to those of the fortunate pluralist who has been appointed. Pluralism in the Church has been almost put down by the strong feeling of public indignation, which was brought to bear upon it for some years; and, perhaps, we ought to be thankful that our profession is not more frequently scandalized by such exhibitions of favouritism as the public has just witnessed in the case of the recent appointment in the Duchy of Lancaster.

The very singular case of Wing v. Taylor, which was argued on Tuesday in the Divorce Court, affords a curious and important illustration of the complications of our ancient statute law, and of the extreme difficulty attending any attempt at its authoritative revision. Two distinct questions were raised in that case. We are at present concerned only with one of them—namely, whether, according to the statute law of England, a marriage in all other respects good is, in fact, null and void if the man had previous carnal knowledge of any woman within the prohibited degrees of affinity towards his wife; whether, for example, as in the case of Wing v. Taylor, the petitioner was entitled to have a decree of nullity of marriage, because, as he alleged, he had, previous to the marriage, connection with the mother of the person whom he married. The statute law upon this subject appears to stand thus:—The 28 Hen. 8, c. 7, settled the prohibited degrees of affinity, and enacted that “if it chanced any man to know carnally any woman, that then all and singular persons being in any degree of consanguinity or affinity as is above written to any of the parties so carnally offending shall be deemed to be within the cases and limits of the said prohibitions of marriage;” and it enacts that from thenceforth no person shall marry within the prohibited degrees. This enactment was entirely repealed by the 17th section of the 1 & 2 Ph. & M. c. 8, which was passed to repeal all articles and provisions made against the See of Rome during and since the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII. The object of the very first Act of the reign of Elizabeth, however, being to restore to the Crown its jurisdiction in ecclesiastical and spiritual matters, there arises a question whether the particular enactment in the Act of Hen. 8 which we have quoted above was revived by the statute of Elizabeth; and on the decision of this point will probably depend the judgment of the Court, which has been reserved. It is a curious circumstance that for three centuries this question should never have been distinctly raised, although there are reported cases in which it might have been; but we now allude to it not merely on account of its intrinsic importance, but as an example of the difficulties which lie in the way of the consolidation of our statute book. Those of our readers who may wish to acquaint themselves more fully with the law upon the point raised in Wing v. Taylor, will find much useful and interesting information about it in Harrison v. Burwell, Vaughan's Reports 206, and Hill v. Good, ib. 302, two cases which do not appear to have been cited in the argument of Wing v. Taylor.

Another very singular case upon the law of marriage has recently been discussed in the House of Lords, and was decided on last Monday. In Beumish v. Beumish the question was simply whether a clergyman could perform a valid marriage between himself and another person. The Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland decided that he could do so, and this judgment has been reversed in the House of Lords mainly upon the ground that the House was bound by its own decision in The Queen v. Millis. The effect of the recent decision is that a marriage by a clergyman to be valid must be celebrated by a third person in facie ecclesie.

The Cambridge University Volunteer Corps has invited the Inns of Court Volunteer Corps to a field day at Cambridge in the approaching month of May, and we believe that a large number of the members of the latter corps have signified their willingness to accept the invitation. It is expected that the 18th of May will be the day for the excursion, and that not less than 300 members of the Inns of Court Corps will muster on the occasion.

It is said that the Lord Chancellor has decided upon yielding to the request of Lord Chelmsford and the other Law Lords to have the Attorney-General's Bankruptcy Bill referred to a Select Committee of the House of Lords. If this rumour should prove correct it is by no means unlikely that considerable changes may be made in the part of the Bill which relates to the constitution of the proposed new Court of Appeal, as a majority of the Law Lords appear to be in favour of continuing the appeal in bankruptcy to the Chancery Judges, and, therefore, opposed to the appointment of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

LORD CRANWORTH'S BILL TO AMEND THE LAWS RELATING TO CHARITABLE USES.

The Mortmain Acts may be regarded in three distinct phases—according as we consider their contravention of the rule against perpetuities; the nature of the property to which they relate; or the administration and judicial procedure best adapted to the effective working of corporate or charitable institutions. The present observations are intended to apply only to the second of these heads of inquiry. The distinction of property into real and personal, which runs throughout our entire jurisprudence, has been, perhaps, in no branch of law more productive of inconvenience than in that of which we are now treating. This complication has been in a great measure owing to the spirit in which the judges have endeavoured to carry out the provisions of the Mortmain Acts, and the astuteness which they have consequently shown in bringing cases within their purview, notwithstanding that the general leaning of the Court is against a wide application of the doctrine of equitable conversion. But the main cause of the intricacies of the laws of mortmain is to be attributed to the difficulties that always attend the application of this doctrine. The Mortmain Acts apply only to donations of real estate, or of property savouring of realty. Pure personalty is left, as at common law, wholly in the power of its owner, to be granted by will, or by a transaction inter vivos, without any ceremony being required to perfect the grant except what the law may require in case the donation were made to a private individual. Very many cases, however, have occurred in which land has been directed to be converted into money, or, e converso, in which money has been directed to be invested in land, and great difficulty has thus arisen in applying to such cases the equitable doctrine of conversion, and determining whether the subject matter of the donation were sufficiently impressed with the character which the donor intended to impart to it. If money were directed by a testator to be laid out in the purchase of land for charitable uses, the sum so bequeathed became, in the eyes of equity, real estate, and the bequest was, therefore, void. The direction as to its conversion into realty, however, might not be sufficiently imperative to alter the legal incidents of the subject of the grant; and hence great litigation has frequently arisen between the representatives of the donor and the declared objects of his bounty. Moreover, a donation might have been intended to be made out of personalty; but, if it becomes necessary to resort to the real estate of the donor, so far the gift fails. Before directing the attention of the reader to the remedy for these evils, a brief statement of the origin and development of the mortmain laws, and of some of the cases in which their application has been found most difficult, may facilitate a right comprehension of the necessity, as well as of the efficacy, of the remedy we propose. This is, indeed, almost too obvious to require much advocacy, were it not so long overlooked. It appears to us to consist in the abolition of the distinction of possessions into real and personal, so far as the Mortmain Acts are concerned, and the enactment of a single comprehensive measure which will apply equally to all descriptions of property.

Corporations had at common law a capacity to take lands, but not without a license both from the lord of the seignory and from the Sovereign, the lord paramount of all estates in the kingdom. Under the feudal law, the lord of a seignory was entitled to certain services or fines upon the succession of the heir, or the marriage of the daughter, of his tenant; and if the latter attempted to settle or alien the land in any manner that would abridge these privileges of the lord, the latter could enter for a forfeiture, the tenant having thus committed a breach of fealty, in violation of the terms of the feudal compact. But a corporation had no daughters upon whose marriage the lord could obtain the usual reliefs, nor heirs, since in construction of law it never died, and "Nemo est hæres viventis." The alienation of lands to such a body being thus a virtual renunciation of all seignorial claims, a license from the lord and from the Crown was necessary even at common law. A similar dispensing power existed in the civil law, which ordained that a special privilege was indispensable to enable a corporation to take lands. Collegium, si nullo speciali privilegio subnixum sit, hæreditatem capere non posse, dubium non est, Cod. 6, 8, 24. The English legislature added other restrictions, upon the ground that lands thus alienated were removed from the active uses of commerce for a period beyond that allowed by the rule against perpetuities. The true reason, however, why alienations in mortmain were discountenanced by the feudal nobility of the middle ages is probably to be ascribed, not so much to the regard which the aristocracy of that period entertained for the interests of commerce, as it is to their losses of aids, reliefs, &c., before-mentioned, and also to their jealousy of the growth of ecclesiastical power. Of the many explanations of the primary sense of the word Mortmain offered by Sir Edward Coke, 1 Inst. 2, the most probable is the one preferred by Blackstone, viz., that religious persons being dead in law, lands holden by them were in mortuâ manu. The term is at present used to denote all the possessions of corporations, whether these be religious or lay, and is used chiefly to express the dead and unserviceable character of such possessions, so far as the purposes of commerce are concerned. Our readers are, of course, aware that most of the peculiar complications of English law, and its administration in the distinct channels of law and equity, have arisen from the conflict for pre-eminence that has so long existed between the common and the civil law. The statutes which directly or indirectly affect alienations in mortmain indicate, like so many legal epochs, the successive stages of this juridical contest, and illustrate the gradual development of our present law of real property.

Magna Charta (9 Hen. 3, c. 36) was the first mortmain statute. It forbids the giving of lands to religious houses, which were almost the only corporations then in being. The statute 7 Ed. 1, c. 2, extended the prohibition to grants made to the secular clergy. Notwithstanding this statute, however, grants to such corporations are only voidable and not void, unless they be made for charitable uses, within the meaning of the statute of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, in which case they are absolutely void. A lease for twenty, or even ninety-nine years, appears not to be within the former statutes, but the law is otherwise as to a lease for a long term. The statute 13 Ed. 1, provided that religious corporations should derive no benefit from recoveries, and the same bodies are excepted in the statute Quia Emptores, 18 Ed. 1, c. 1, by which tenants obtained full power to alien their lands. The 15 Rich. 2, c. 2, likewise exempts religious houses from the benefit of trusts. This statute was the first Mortmain Act passed in respect to lay corporations; it extended to these the provisions of the statute 7 Ed. 1, c. 2. The statute 23 Hen. 8, c. 10, which is the first Act against superstitious uses, prohibits alienations of land made for devotional purposes to non-corporate bodies, such as churchwardens, &c. Such donations, it appears, were not within the previous statutes of mortmain, and were not void, although constituting a perpetuity. This was allowed probably on the ground of the prevalence of the custom. The statute 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, completes our list of the Mortmain Acts. The object of that Act, however, is not to prevent alienations in mortmain, but to prescribe certain formalities to grants of land for charitable purposes. Alienations in mortmain were not made void by the statutes passed prior to this Act, so as to let in the grantor or his heirs, but amounted to a forfeiture of the lands to the superior lord. Mesne lords, however, as also the sovereign, the lord paramount, could dispense with their own privileges—Quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. A license from these was, therefore, efficacious, notwithstanding the mortmain statutes. After the feudal tenures were abolished by the statute 12 Car. 2, c. 24, the value of a seignior became much diminished. Moreover, few mesne seigniories existed even at that period, owing to the long operation of the statute, Quia Emptores, which has prevented subinfeudation. The statute 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 37, accordingly, has vested in the Crown alone full powers to dispense with the statutes of mortmain. But, as at common law, no devise of lands was good, and as corporations are expressly excepted in the statute of wills, 32 Hen. 8, c. 1, no devise of lands to a corporation was valid until the statute 43 Eliz. c. 3, allowed such devises in cases of charities. This exception has been greatly narrowed by the statute, 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. The first section of this statute enacts that no manors, lands, or hereditaments, chattels, or sums of money to be laid out in the purchase of lands, shall be given or granted to any person or body politic for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever, unless the conveyance be by deed indented, sealed, and delivered in the presence of two witnesses, twelve months before the death of the grantor, and enrolled within six months next after its execution. The same section also enacts that donations of stock, to be valid, should be completed by an actual transfer six months before the death of the donor, and that all grants of land and of money or stock to be laid out in the purchase of land, be made to take effect immediately in possession for the intended charitable use, and be without any power of revocation or reservation whatsoever for the benefit of the donor. The second section exempts grants for valuable consideration from the previous provisions as to the sealing and delivery of the deeds of grant and as to the transfer of stock at the specified periods, respectively, before the grantor's death. Such deeds, however, are equally as liable to all the other formalities required by the Act, as if they comprised merely voluntary grants. The third section of the Act provides that all deeds, not in accordance with the prescribed formalities, shall be null and void. The fourth section exempts from the purview of the Act the two Universities and the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster.

A general impression having prevailed that all the conditions prescribed by this Act were waived by the second section as to cases of purchases made by charities, a general disregard of all the formalities prescribed by the first section frequently occurred in such cases of purchase. The Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 85, was passed to remedy some of these mistakes. It does not apply to deeds which contain a reservation in favour of the grantor, and it has only a retrospective operation. The chief object of Lord Cranworth's Bill, which is now before Parliament, is to dispense in future, in cases of purchase, with most of the formalities required by the Act of George 2. The first section of the Bill proposes that no deed or assurance hereafter to be made for charitable uses, shall be deemed void within the meaning of the Act of George 2, by reason of not being indented, nor by reason of reserving to the grantor a nominal rent, mines, easements, covenants as to repair or enjoyment, or a right of entry on breach of such stipulations; nor, as regards copyholds and customary freeholds, for want of a deed; nor, in cases of a purchase for full consideration, by reason of the consideration consisting of a rent reserved to the vendor or to any other person, provided that in all reservations the owner or vendor shall reserve the same benefits for his representatives as for himself. The second section provides that when the uses of a deed of conveyance are declared by a separate deed, the enrolment of the latter alone is in future to be sufficient. The third section validates all past deeds made for full value, under which possession is now held, if such deeds were made to take effect immediately in possession, without any power of revocation, and if such shall be enrolled (if not so already) within twelve months after the passing of this Act. The fourth section provides that if the uses of such deeds have been declared by separate deeds, the enrolment of the latter alone will be sufficient. The fifth section provides that the Act is not to invalidate any deed otherwise good, nor to apply to deeds already avoided or sought to be avoided in due course of law. The acknowledgment of deeds thirty years old, and of any other deeds, which it is impossible to have acknowledged within twelve months after the passing of the Act, is also declared unnecessary prior to enrolment. The last section of the Bill exempts from its provisions, Ireland, Scotland, the two Universities, and the colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster.

The case of Jeffries v. Alexander (7 Jur. N. S. 221), decided by the House of Lords last session, illustrates very clearly the various complications to which the present state of the law of mortmain has given rise. In this case a deed of covenant was executed by A. B. five years before his death, whereby he agreed that he would in his lifetime, or that his executors should within twelve months after his decease, but subject to the payment of his debts and legacies, invest a certain sum of money in Consols, in the names of trustees, for certain charitable uses. Part of the property left by the covenantor at his death consisted of personalty savouring of the realty. The House of Lords (Lords Cranworth and Wensleydale dissenting), held, reversing the decision of the Lords Justices, who had reversed that of Sir J. Romilly, M. R., that the deed of covenant, so far as the chattels real were concerned, was within the meaning of the third section of the Mortmain Act, and, therefore, void, although the deed did not ex facie violate the provisions of that statute. Where the proceeds of an estate devised to be sold were bequeathed in trust for charitable purposes, Lord Hardwicke held the bequest void, although such a bequest had no tendency to bring the lands into mortmain; Attorney-General v. Lord Weymouth (Amb. 25). On the other hand, if a testator whose assets consisted exclusively of a bond due from a deceased obligor, were to make any charitable bequest, the real estate of the obligor would be resorted to if necessary for the purpose of discharging the bequest, Foone v. Blount (Cowp. 464). The principle of this case, however, which was cited by Lord Cranworth in support of his dissent in Jeffries v. Alexander, appears to be easily distinguished from that affirmed by the latter case, inasmuch as the resort to realty for satisfaction of the bequest in Jeffries v. Alexander, was rendered necessary by the donor's own acts; but in Foone v. Blount, this necessity was owing to the nature of the property of a party who had nothing to do with the bequest, and who could not, therefore, be affected by the Mortmain Act. In Harrison v. Harrison (1 Russ. & M. 71), a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money was held to be an interest within the meaning of the Mortmain Act: inasmuch as the vendor, like a mortgagee, had the legal estate, until a conveyance was perfected.

Assets are never marshalled in favour of charities: Mogg v. Hodges, (2 Ves. 53). Such bequests, moreover, fail in the proportion in which, if valid, they should have been paid out of realty, or out of personalty savouring of realty, such as mortgages, leaseholds, &c., Attorney-General v. Tyndal (2 Eden. 207). But a testator may direct his charitable bequests to be paid exclusively out of his pure personalty, and the Court will give effect to his intention; Robinson v. Geldard (3 Mac. & G. 735.) In Tempest v. Tempest, 5 W. R. 402, a testatrix by her will gave her real estate to trustees upon certain trusts, and amongst divers specific and pecuniary bequests bequeathed to the same trustees such a sum of money as when invested in consols would produce a certain clear annual income upon trust for certain specified charitable uses. She also directed that the said charitable bequests should be paid in precedence of other pecuniary legacies bequeathed by the same will out of such part of her personal property not specifically bequeathed as was by law applicable for charitable purposes, and she gave the residue of her personal property to the said trustees upon the trusts in the will mentioned. By an order of Wood, V.C., on further consideration it was declared that the debts and funeral expenses of the testatrix, and the costs of the suit for administering her estate, were primarily payable out of her personal estate savouring of the realty. The ground of this decision would appear to be that the general rule against marshalling in favour of charities was neutralized in this case by the demonstrative character of the charitable bequests; demonstrative legacies not being liable to abate rateably with general or pecuniary legacies on a deficiency of assets. (Vide "Smith's Com. Real and Per. Pro.," 826.) On appeal from this order, the Lord Chancellor held that the testatrix did not indicate an intention of exempting the pure personalty from its usual liability to contribute rateably with the personalty savouring of the realty to the debts and funeral expenses of the testatrix, and that, therefore, the charitable bequests could be enforced only against the portion of the pure personalty which remained after such a deduction. The principle of this decision appears to be that the rule against marshalling in favour of charities is not to be waived, except upon the expression of a clear intention in a will to that effect, and that a bequest of a demonstrative legacy out of a fund of pure personalty is not a sufficient indication of such an intention. These cases, and especially the judgments in Jeffries v. Alexander, clearly depict the complications which the distinction of property into realty and personalty has produced in this branch of law.

The laws and procedure relating to the administration of charities are in a very unsatisfactory state, notwithstanding that the reports of commissioners on the subject fill twenty-eight volumes folio, and cover 28,000 pages. Upon this branch of the laws of charities we do not offer any comments at present. We merely suggest, that, while the administration of charitable funds is, no doubt, wholly distinct in its juridical relations from the laws which should regulate charitable donations and bequests, yet we would gladly see the whole mechanism, as well as the theory, of charities provided for by a single comprehensive enactment. Partial legislation is seldom desirable. By the Endowed Schools Act of last session, trustees of schools were bound to open them to Dissenters, without imposing any conformity to the Church of England. As an alleged corollary to this Act, the Trustees of Charities Bill, lately before Parliament, proposed that the appointment of the trustees of schools should be made without reference to religious qualifications. This Bill, if passed, might have been also found to be unequal even to the object of its author, as also wanting in harmony with the other parts of the system. But if the administration of charities was provided for on the same principles, and by the same statute that regulated charitable donations and bequests, the chances of an incongruity between the theory and the working of these institutions would be greatly obviated. We regret that Lord Cranworth does not propose to deal with the whole law of mortmain, and submit a single comprehensive measure, which would be calculated to obviate the existing causes of difficulty. We do not see why purchases made by charitable institutions should be subjected to peculiar restrictions as to the formalities of conveyancing. If the accumulation of wealth by charitable corporations should be discountenanced upon grounds of public policy, let the law declare this. But it is somewhat absurd to allow these corporations to take as much personalty, and buy as much realty, as they can, but subject to restrictions which are necessarily troublesome and almost frivolous.

The main cause of the intricacies of the laws of mortmain is, doubtless, to be referred to their applying merely to grants of realty. The first Mortmain Acts applied only to donations of land, as the personal property in the kingdom in those times was comparatively trivial, and incapable of conferring political power upon its possessors. The subsequent Mortmain Acts followed in the same track, and thus, in the Act of George the Second, we find no mention of personal property, except such as is directed to be converted into realty, although at that period the personalty of British subjects was of very considerable value. If the principle, then, of the Mortmain Acts be politic, they should, surely, apply to that description of property which at present constitutes so large a portion of the national wealth. The importance of extending their provisions to personalty is still greater than can be indicated by any estimate of the relative value of the personalty and the realty of British subjects, since the real estate which is not tied up in family settlements, and which alone can be granted to charitable or any other uses, is the only realty which the Mortmain Acts can affect. This amount of realty is, we may assume, at any given time, not a very large proportion of the whole landed wealth of the kingdom. On the other hand, the proportion of the whole personalty of British subjects, which is not out of the reach of transfer or donation, is always very great, and it is with this amount the proportion of disposable realty is to be compared. The laws of mortmain, then, have provided only for that part of the national wealth which, in respect to our present inquiry, is far the less valuable; while the distinction between realty and personalty, which these laws recognise, have been, as we have shown, productive of immense litigation. Land, indeed, affords, by reason of its indestructibility, a basis of peculiar value for the adjustment of political rights, and for securing an independence for an unborn generation; and to this limited extent we consider that the distinction which our law takes between real and personal property, has had very beneficial results. But when we find this distinction unnecessarily maintained in other branches of law, we should recur to first principles, and not perpetuate an undue extension of antiquated and subtle rules in a state of society and of national wealth, to which those distinctions were not originally intended to apply. Our mortmain laws, then, it is obvious, should equally relate to personalty and realty. Moreover, the equitable doctrine of conversion has so confused the boundaries of real and personal estate, that unless the former species of property greatly preponderated in value over the latter, the expensive distinction should be abrogated. It has not been our intention to have discussed in this paper the political phases of the laws of mortmain. The present principle of these laws is perhaps sufficiently sound, as after a license is obtained by the intended donee, the subject has full power to grant away all his property during his life, or at least before the period likely to precede the approach of his last illness. The law ordains, wisely, we think, that a testator should not selfishly enjoy his property during life, and then, on his death-bed, with a view to his own spiritual good, cheat his relations or expectant heirs, or other relatives. This rule of public policy is not likely to conflict with the religious opinions of any class. But, whatever may be the principles of public policy which the legislature shall adopt for its guidance as to the laws of mortmain, it is, we think, an indispensable condition to the salutary operation of those laws, that they should make no distinction between grants of real and of personal property.

The English Law of Domicil.

X. (Continued.)

It has been made a matter of argument, though never hrown out even as a dictum by a judge, but indeed an opinion expressed to the contrary, that a sojourn in a foreign country for the sole purpose of amassing property, when such a result occurs, will cause a reverter of the domicil of origin without the factum of arrival at, and residence in, that original domicil, the abandonment of the acquired domicil, and the dying in itinere, being sufficient to re-vest the old domicil, if I may use the expression; but this is so manifestly open to objection that it cannot be supported. Were it the law, the effect would be that every departure from one place with an intention to proceed to another would ipso facto cause a new domicil to be acquired in that other place, in which case the true ingredient would be wanting, namely, the party being so far a subject of that country that his property can be dealt with by the laws of that country, into which he has not even set his foot. Upon this point the question naturally arises, whether a man can have more than one domicil? But that I have before considered and is easily answered; for the very fact of its being necessary that he should either abandon one domicil before he can acquire another, or acquire another before he can abandon the first, shows that the law considers him as incapable of having more than one. (See Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 791.) If the domicil is in a foreign country, our law, of course, cannot deal with it quoad property, except according to the law of such country, and, therefore, it is upon the question, whether it can deal with it or no that the fact of the domicil mainly turns.

A case may be supposed where a domicil of origin is totally abandoned, and sojourns made in a variety of places during the whole remainder of the party's life, and in such a case the point would rest between the domicil of birth or origin, and the circumstances attending the other different residences, and whether in the course of such wanderings any preference was shown to any particular place, such a residence being retained there, etc., and it would be difficult to say in such a case which would preponderate, although the domicil of birth would certainly be entitled to every possible degree of weight, and could not be displaced, except, first, by a sufficient residence in the other supposed locality sufficient to fix a domicil, and an express intention to return to it, although at an unknown and unfixed time. Possession of property, more particularly if it consists of houses or furniture, is always sufficient to preponderate, the true test, indeed, being, that wherever there is a manifest intention permanently to reside, there is the domicil. In the case of discursive movements from place to place, evidence is a most important portion of it, and the habits, turn of mind, and the intention of the person must be the guides in weighing such evidence; for where all is involved in such a degree of uncertainty, the slightest circumstance will be of consequence.

From all this it follows, that there is scarcely a case, be it ever so complicated, that cannot receive some kind of determination by the application of the general principles laid down upon this subject; and it must always be borne in mind that except in the case of domicil of birth or origin, where residence would be insufficient, the animus and the factum must be proved, that is the residence and intention to remain, without which no domicil can exist. Having said thus much as the result of the cases, let us examine the cases themselves. The case of Sir Charles Douglas (see Ommaney v. Bingham, cited in a note to Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 379) is very strongly illustrative of this subject. In 1741, Sir Charles Douglas left Scotland (his native country), when only twelve years old, and entered the navy. When he attained the rank of captain, and not until then, did he return to Scotland, but left it again, married in Holland, where he had an establishment, and again came to Scotland for the purpose of introducing his wife to his friends and connections, and remained there about twelve months. He commanded in the Russian navy, and was then in the Dutch service, and when he visited Scotland it was only temporarily, meantime having a residence at Gosport, where his wife and family lived; and lastly, being appointed to the Halifax station, he came to Scotland and died there. During all this time he never had a house of his own in Scotland having made his will describing himself as of Gosport; and yet, upon the case being tried in Scotland, the Court of Session determined the domicil to be Scotch, merely upon the circumstances of the domicil of origin being Scotch, and his having died there; although he had expressed himself to a near relative as never meaning to settle there. There was no doubt that this decision was quite contrary to the present state of the law, whatever it might then have been, and accordingly we find that the case was appealed to the House of Lords, when their lordships reversed the decision of the Court below, and held that the domicil was English and not Scotch, upon the very obvious and rational ground that his home, where he had settled with his wife and family and where he really lived whilst on shore, was at Gosport. Moreover, he had actually lived in other countries, and therefore, having acquired the rights and liabilities of a subject there, unless he had actually acquired a domicil in England, any one of those might have been preferred to Scotland, his domicil of origin having been abandoned, unless he had totally lost all those, the distinction between abandoning and losing being very great; for although abandonment may result in loss, yet mere abandonment is not synonymous with loss, unless it is followed up by subsequent acquirement of domicil elsewhere. Lord v. Colvin, 7 Weekly Reporter, 250; In Re James Muir deceased, ibid. 361.

With reference to the subject of residence in various countries, the case of Bempde v. Johnstone, 3 Ves. 198, is important, the decision there was on the ground that here had been no acquirement of a fresh domicil, although the habits of the party were very discursive; and the Lord Chancellor considered it as settled that where there were two equal domicils, (supposing that possible,) the domicil of birth or death must preponderate, and not the lex loci rei sitæ; and it was made a question by the Master of the Rolls in Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 760-1, which would prevail, and he seemed to think that the domicil of death would prevail, as you might suppose a case in which a person came from no one knew whither, but died in a particular country, so that at all events, that was certain. Now, no doubt, that rule would be a very convenient one, and might be adopted in case it could not be ascertained where the forum originis was; but I think the bearing of the law at present would be in favour of the domicil of origin, because the law absolutely recognizes the one, and does not ipso facto recognize the other, that is, it is silent on the subject. Whereas a man must have a domicil of origin, that is, he must have a domicil, whatever country he is born in, by birth merely, although not perhaps by reference to his parents; for, as was observed in the argument in the case last referred to (vide 5 Ves. p. 761), even if a man is born on board of a ship, he has a forum originis by reference to the country to which the ship belongs, for it either takes him to that country, or it has not taken him to any other. In Bruce v. Bruce (elsewhere referred to), intention was held not to prevail, but actual residence; and there, the party being by origin a Scotchman, gained a domicil in England and in India, or rather, had he ever abandoned one, would certainly by his acts have acquired another. The Court of Session there decided on the lex loci rei sitæ, but Lord Thurlow took the ground of domicil, and decided on that, though, as it was said, unwillingly. Where a person resides in different countries as a servant of Government, discharging duties of a temporary character, it has been thought to be the law of Europe that such employment does not change the domicil; whereas, if the duty is permanent, it has that effect; and this latter rule would probably apply to the case of any office where the retention depends upon the conduct of the person holding it, and is exercised in a fixed locality, or at all events, within the limits of the same country; whereas, it seems clear that an office or calling which compels residence in various countries, such as that of a soldier or a sailor on duty, does not either prevent a domicil being acquired in the ordinary way, or necessarily take away a domicil of origin, not being included strictly in the cases of necessary domicils. To illustrate this, it continually happens that a man holding a military or more usually naval commission forms a matrimonial connection in England, takes a house and sets up an establishment, and resides there, whenever he can obtain leave of absence, his wife constantly residing there, and yet, although he may himself actually reside for a lengthened period at a time in many different countries in succession, there can be no doubt that his domicil is English; and this, being so common a case, that most persons must have known many instances of it, is a fair test. (Denisart, Dictionnaire, 2; letter D. p. 165.) In the case of half-pay, where leave of absence is constantly applied for, and obtained through a long course of years, the original domicil would remain, open, of course, to some circumstance, showing a decided probability that were the question tried the party would abandon the forum originis, and throw up the half-pay. The case of Attorney-General v. Dunn, 8 M. & W. 511, was a singular one. The original domicil was English; but the whole of the property being removed from this country, a foreign marquisate was purchased along with a chateau, which was put into a state of repair, the house being furnished, the grounds laid out, and an establishment of servants placed in it; but the improvements not being complete, the party had never actually resided there, but had lived in lodgings in various towns in the vicinity, or in some instances at some distance, although returning to it from time to time to inspect the progress of the works, and dying before the repairs and embellishments were completed. Under these circumstances, it was held that the domicil remained English, because the ingredient of residence in a permanent abode was wanting to complete the acquirement of a domicil. This was a very strong case, for it established the principle that it is not necessary to possess any property whatever in the country in which the domicil is retained. I have gone so fully into this part of my subject that I shall only refer to one or two more cases, because they embrace almost every principle upon which a decision can be come to. The first case I shall mention is that of Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 760, which was most elaborately argued, and is most fully reported, and considering that this kind of law was then comparatively in its infancy, I suppose no case could be found where so much is embraced in one view. The question related to the personal estate of the late Lord Somerville, the great mass of it being in England, and the family estate in Scotland, Lord Somerville having been extremely uncertain and various in his movements. He was born in Scotland, in June 1727, either at the family mansion, or a house occupied during the time it was repairing, but which was uncertain; he was at school at Dalkeith and Edinburgh, and afterwards in Gloucestershire. He was then sent to Westminster School, which he left at Christmas 1743. From thence he went to Caen in Normandy, where he remained until the year 1745, when the rebellion breaking out in Scotland he returned to that country at his father's request, joined the Royal Army, and was present at the battles of Culloden and Preston Pans; he remained with his regiment until 1763, when he returned to Scotland and had an annuity settled upon him by his father. He then went to the Continent, but his father being taken ill, he returned in 1765, and was present at his funeral, remaining in Scotland for some months afterwards. He then applied for the same apartments as his father was in the habit of occupying in Holyrood house, but such application failing of success, he went to London, where he usually passed the winter, coming to Somerville House in Scotland during the summer. In 1779, he took a lease for twenty-one years of a house in Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square, where he was assessed to and paid taxes, and being elected one of the sixteen peers attended the duties following upon such election. The two establishments were carried on in this manner, viz., in Scotland he kept up his full establishment, but in London two female servants only, when not resident, and brought servants with him when he came from Scotland; he lived, besides, in a very retired manner, seldom dined at home, and his establishment of servants was on board wages, and the house was not kept up upon a liberal scale; when sold, the furniture realized £140 only, and it appeared by the evidence that he himself considered Scotland as his home, and his house in London only as a temporary resting place. He died suddenly in 1796 in London intestate, leaving real estates in Scotland and in England, and a large sum of money in the English funds being described in the bank books as of Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square; and the question of domicil was, therefore, one of great moment.

WILLS OF PERSONALTY BY BRITISH SUBJECTS BILL.

Lord KINGSDOWN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained at considerable length that the object of the measure was to amend the present law respecting wills of British subjects abroad. The Bill proposed that any future will good with respect to real estate should also be good with respect to personal estate, be the domicile what it might.

The LORD CHANCELLOR and Lord CRANWORTH supported the Bill.

Lord WENSLEYDALE and Lord ST. LEONARDS opposed.

Lord KINGSDOWN having briefly replied to the objections raised against the Bill,

The Bill was read a second time.

ADMIRALTY COURT JURISDICTION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that the House of Commons had agreed to this Bill, but had added a clause to give the Admiralty Court jurisdiction in reference to disputes which might arise between co-owners of ships, in order to prevent the necessity of an application to the Court of Chancery. He recommended their lordships to agree to the amendment adding words to confine its operation to disputes between co-owners.

The Commons' amendment thus restricted was then agreed to.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the insertion of words requiring the Lord Chancellor to see a lunatic before deciding whether he should give his consent or not to a new trial.

The Bill was read a third time, and, as amended, passed.

Thursday, April 25.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table the amendments he proposed to move in this Bill, and hoped Lord Chelmsford would also lay on the table his proposed amendments, so that their lordships might be better able to come to a decision on the motion to refer the Bill to a select committee. If the amendments extended beyond mere details to important clauses, he thought it would be highly objectionable to refer the Bill to a select committee.

Lord CHELMSFORD said that the amendments which he intended to propose were not confined entirely to details. He would lay them on the table as soon as possible, but he should not be able to do so before Monday or Tuesday next.

COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Mr. COWPER moved for leave to bring in a Bill to enable the Commissioners of her Majesty's Works to acquire a site for the erection of courts of justice and of various offices belonging to the same.

Leave granted, and the Bill brought in and read a first time.

SALMON FISHERIES.

In reply to a question from Mr. Hopwood,

Sir G. LEWIS stated that a Salmon Fisheries Bill for England and Wales was in course of preparation, and no time would be lost in producing it.

PENDING MEASURES OF LEGISLATION.

A BILL TO AMEND THE LAW WITH RESPECT TO WILLS OF PERSONAL ESTATE MADE BY BRITISH SUBJECTS.

1. Every will and other testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same or at the time of his or her death) shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted in England and Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where the same was made or by the law of the place where such person was domiciled when the same was made, or by the laws then in force in any part of the United Kingdom.

2 Every will and other testamentary instrument made within the United Kingdom by any British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same or at the time of his or her death) shall as regards personal estate be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted in England and Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be executed according to the forms required by the laws for the time being in force in that part of the United Kingdom where the same is made.

3. No will or other testamentary instrument shall be held to be revoked or to have become invalid by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same.

4. Nothing in this Act contained shall invalidate or affect any will or other testamentary instrument as regards personal estate which would have been valid if this Act had not been passed, except as such will or other testamentary instrument may be revoked or altered by any subsequent will or testamentary instrument made valid by this Act.

5. This Act shall extend only to wills and other testamentary instruments made by persons who die after the passing of this Act.

EQUITY.

LEGACY TO EXECUTOR.

Algermann v. Ford, M. R., 9 W. R. 512.

It was laid down in Harrison v. Rowley, 4 Ves. 212, that if a legacy is given to a man as executor, whether expressed to be for care and pains or not, he must, in order to entitle himself to the legacy, clothe himself with the character of executor. But it is sufficient if the executor has shown his intention to act, although he may not have proved the will; and therefore, in the above case, where an executor died before probate, shortly after the testatrix, he, having concurred with the other executors in directions for the funeral, and in paying some small sums on that occasion, was held entitled to a legacy given for his care and loss of time in the execution of the trusts of the will. Another case to the same effect was that of Brydges v. Wotton, 1 V. & B. 134, where a trustee, dying nineteen months after the testatrix, without having acted, was held entitled to a legacy given as a token of regard and a recompense for his trouble, no refusal or neglect to act, where necessary, appearing. It is to be observed that this was the case of a trustee, whose duty would not, like that of an executor, arise immediately upon the death of the testator. It is also to be observed that in both these cases the legacies were given expressly in recompense for trouble; but it is clear from Reed v. Devaynes, 2 Cox 285, that no such expression is necessary to create the obligation of proving or acting under the will. In that case the testator appointed executors of his will, "desiring them to accept £100 each as a mark of my gratitude for the friendship they have shown me." One of the executors claimed to be entitled to his legacy, although he declined to prove the will. The Court said that he must prove, and on his doing so, after the hearing of the cause, he was allowed his legacy.

In the case now before us a testator gave all his real and personal estate to A. and B., whom he appointed his executors and trustees, upon trust to pay his debts, &c., and also to pay to B. a legacy of £1,000 "for his own use and benefit," and to invest the residue upon trusts, one of which was to pay an annuity. The testator died in 1852, and his will was proved in 1853 by A. alone, B. having renounced probate, but not having disclaimed the trusts of the will. A large part of the estate was not got in until 1859, in which year B. retracted his renunciation, and probate was granted to him. This suit was commenced shortly afterwards for the administration of the estate against A. and B. The legacy of £1,000 had been allowed by the chief clerk to B., and the propriety of this allowance was now questioned. The Master of the Rolls said that B.'s right depended on whether he bonâ fide took on himself the duty of an executor. He noticed that the principal burden of administration had to be performed after B. proved the will. B. had been made a defendant and had duly accounted in the suit. In this state of circumstances his Honour could not take into account the greater or less time during which he had renounced. If he proved at any time before the real business of the trust was concluded, that was enough to entitle him to the legacy. This case goes rather further than Reed v. Devaynes, where the executor had declined to prove, but had not formally renounced. The Master of the Rolls gave interest only from the day on which B. took probate.

COMMON LAW.

LAW OF COPYRIGHT—HOW AFFECTED BY 9 ANN. C. 19—DRAMATISING A NOVEL.

Roade v. Conquest, C. P., 9 W. R. 434.

There are, perhaps, not many topics connected with the law so universally interesting as that of copyright. Almost every one has written or may write a book; or is, or hopes to be, the author of some design of art, in the beneficiary production of which he is desirous of protection, and of understanding the extent to which that protection is afforded him by law. It will, therefore, perhaps not be unacceptable to our readers if we attempt to give here some account (though necessarily succinct and imperfect) of the right of copyright as now existing in this country—a theme for which the present case of Reade v. Conquest supplies an apt text. "Copyright" is that right which an author possesses with respect to exclusively printing and reprinting, publishing and re-publishing, his own original work; and, to a certain extent, it has always doubtless existed as part of our legal system—copyright being, in fact, only a species of an incorporeal chattel, and, as such, forming part of that property in which rights can be claimed. Accordingly, in the discussion which arose in the great case of Miller v. Taylor (of which more will be said presently) it was taken as clear law that it formed part of this common law right (whatever its whole scope might be) that no person other than, and contrary to the will of, the author could publish for the first time an original manuscript. The case just referred to (which is the leading one among the earlier decisions upon this branch of the law) arose about fifty years after the passing of the statute 9 Ann. c. 19, before which Act (strange to say) the rights of authors as such had never been ascertained or otherwise interfered with by the Legislature; and one of the questions determined in Miller v. Taylor, and in the subsequent case of Donaldson v. Beckett (connected with it, and reported in the same volume of reports), was as to the effect of this Act of Queen Anne—whether it was declaratory or in abrogation of an author's rights; and whether an author now possesses any copyright independently of the protection afforded to him by that Act. In the first of these cases (Miller v. Taylor, 4 Burr. 2303) the Court of King's Bench determined that an author not only has a perpetual and exclusive right to publish for the first time the fruits of his own brain, but recognised to a certain extent the truth of the proposition contended for before them, that even with respect to a published work the author had a copyright therein, exclusive of the protection afforded by the statute of Anne. But in Donaldson v. Beckett and Others (4 Burr. 2408), which was in effect the same case as Miller v. Taylor, though in different names, this judgment was solemnly reversed in the House of Lords; who decided that the only basis on which any claim to copyright could rest since the date of that statute was, upon its enactments; and that, consequently, such copyright then, at all events, (whatever might have been the case prior to that Act) only protected an author's work for a limited period after its first publication.

Upon the foundation of this statute the right of copyright now stands,—as very recently again determined in the House of Lords in the case of Jeffreys v. Boosey, hereafter more particularly referred to. The statute of Anne, indeed, is not now itself in force, having been superseded by later enactments. The period of protection for fourteen years originally established by it, was afterwards (by 54 Geo. 3, c. 156) extended to twenty-eight years, or the term of life if the author survived that number of years. And by the Act on this subject now in force (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45) this protection is again enlarged, and is fixed to endure for the minimum term of forty-two years. But this period is susceptible of being in fact increased, as the Act provides that the copyright shall not, in any event, expire during the life of the author and for the term of seven years afterwards.

Since the statute of Anne a similar protection (known under the same name of copyright) has been also extended by the Legislature, to a variety of productions of genius which would not come under the term of "books," with which that Act alone dealt. Accordingly, exclusive privileges for a limited period, the same description in general as those enjoyed by authors of books, are now given by statute with respect to engravings, prints, sculptures, models, copies, and casts (4 Geo. 2, c. 13; 7 Geo. 3, c. 38; 17 Geo. 3, c. 57; 38 Geo. 3, c. 71; and 54 Geo. 3, c. 56); and (by the Designs Acts of 1842, 1843, 1850, 1851, and the Protection of Inventions Act, 1851) to any descriptions of articles, whether of ornament or utility.

Protection in this country is also now afforded, under certain conditions, to literary and other productions, though first published in a foreign country, either by foreigners or British subjects. This subject of international copyright is now regulated by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 12, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 12, which provide machinery for protecting books, prints, dramatic pieces, musical compositions, articles of sculpture, and other works of art first published abroad, from being pirated in this country—provided the foreign country where the first publication took place, affords reciprocal protection to parties interested in works first published in this country.

A variety of points have arisen upon the Copyright Acts above referred to. Some of these are, comparatively speaking, unimportant as affecting only the manner in which those Acts are worked; and others, again, involve questions of principle, and are, consequently, of greater interest. Among this last class may be mentioned the cases of Ollendorf v. Black (20 L. J. Ch. 165) and Jeffreys v. Boosey (24 L. J. Exch. 81), which ascertain the law as to the acquisition by foreigners of copyright in this country; and establish that such can only be acquired by them with regard to works first published in this country, where the author is resident here at the time of publication. Another is the case of Novello v. Suddow (12 C. B. 177), which shows that copyright may be violated even by a gratuitous distribution of the work of its author if unauthorised. And to these may be well added the present case, in which the Court of Common Pleas have, on the other hand, unanimously held that a copyright is not violated by an unauthorised dramatizing and causing to be acted on the stage, a story written and published by another. For in order to establish the case of the author of the story and his right to an action against the dramatist, it would be necessary to reverse the decision of the House of Lords in Donaldson v. Beckett (as recently affirmed in Jeffreys v. Boosey); and to rely upon the existence of copyright independent of any statute, as thought to exist by the majority of the Queen's Bench in Miller v. Taylor. And the reason for this necessity is, that to dramatise a story is not a "publication" within the Copyright Acts (see Coleman v. Walker, 5 T. R. 249, and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 2).

Finally, it may be observed that, from the current of the authorities already referred to, it seems fully established that the only common law right which authors now possess with reference to their works, is that a right of action attaches upon an invasion of their copyright (see Beckford v. Hood, 7 T. R. 620); and that a right of action also attaches if a work is pirated before it is published by its author; but after it has been once published, the work is only protected by virtue of the Copyright Acts, and subject to their provisions.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY.

Sir,—It is not often that the members of the Law Students' Debating Society indulge in the luxury of a paper controversy. They are, as a rule, perfectly content with the somewhat barren honours which are always to be reaped under the roof of that noble institution where their debates have been carried on for upwards of a quarter of a century. If, therefore, through one of their officers, they now enter the lists, it is only because they feel that a charge publicly made should be as publicly met and refuted. We have always been so anxious to increase our numbers and extend the influence of our society, and are ever willing to strain a point for the admission of any one desirous of joining us, that we are naturally surprised that any "Limb of the Law" should taunt us with a want of liberality, and insinuate that we are "too exclusive" or "too arbitrary." It is clear, however, that "A Limb of the Law," in his "linked sweetness long drawn out," has not taken any pains to inform himself of the object of the rule in question, and of which he complains; but he is not the less entitled to the explanation which he asks.

When our society was first constituted, the Council of the Incorporated Law Society with great liberality not only offered us the use of one of their arbitration rooms, with the usual appurtenances—such as fire, gas, &c.—in which to hold our debates, but also allowed us access to their valuable library (upon which I am sorry to see that "A Limb of the Law" sets so little value), without which the other privileges would have been utterly useless. All that they asked in return for this was that no one should be entitled to enrol himself amongst our members who did not in some way, either directly or indirectly (i. e. by himself or his employer), contribute to the funds of the Incorporated Law Society. Was this unreasonable or exacting? What, then, is "the head and front of our offending"? That "A Limb of the Law" cannot obtain admittance to our society. I accept the compliment offered to us. But is there not a remedy? "No," says "A Limb of the Law;" for my master is not a member of the Incorporated Law Society; therefore I am not admissible to the library, and cannot qualify for the "Law Students' Debating Society." "I would not so insult him as to ask such a favour." And yet "he is well to do and a highly respectable practitioner." Really, the latter phrase requires no comment, but, in my humble judgment, carries with it its own condemnation. But where's the "insult?" If it be an "insult" to ask a man to become a member of the Incorporated Law Society, might I not reasonably infer that it is a disgrace to belong to it? But why not subscribe to the lectures? "The advantages of attending lectures has been questioned," says "A Limb of the Law." Granted. But can he not use them as a means to an end? If the "consummation devoutly to be wished" is, in truth, an admittance to our society, will it be too dearly purchased by a subscription to one of three courses of the annual lectures for one year only. But he objects "to support one thing for the advantages to be derived from another." Is not this—to adopt a vulgar saying—very like "cutting off one's nose to be revenged on one's face"? In conclusion, if what I have said should fail to induce "A Limb of the Law" to make a desperate effort to obtain the wished-for goal, I shall be sorry, for he is evidently well armed for the fight, and must soon become a star of the first magnitude. It is far from our desire to "limit" our "sphere of action." On the contrary, we have room enough for all; but we do not go into the highways and "compel them to come in." Nor is it our wish or our intention to break faith with the Council of the Incorporated Law Society by a relaxation of the rule in question. Our members are volunteers, not pressmen. Should, however, "A Limb of the Law" come amongst us, I prophesy that the advantage he will derive will be so great that he will not long remain "A Limb of the Law" only, but will, with both limbs, at no distant period, "bestride the narrow world like a Colossus." He will find us neither "exclusive" nor "arbitrary." We shall all gladly welcome him—myself amongst the number; and not the less so because I have the honour to be, what I now subscribe myself,

THE TREASURER OF THE LAW STUDENTS'
DEBATING SOCIETY.

14, Old Jewry-chambers, London, E.C.,
April 25, 1861.

In reply to your correspondent, "A Limb of the Law,"* I would recommend him to sacrifice his prejudices to the small extent of subscribing to the lectures at the Law Institution, in order to qualify him if he desires to join the Law Students' Debating Society. He will then be better able to judge the propriety of the rules and advocate any alteration that he may think desirable. It is impossible to make arrangements which will suit all opinions, and your correspondent will understand the difficulty of adopting every suggestion that may be made. The advantages of the Debating Society are intended to be confined to those connected with the Incorporated Law Society, from which many benefits are derived.

Review.

The Province of Jurisprudence Determined. Second Edition. By the late JOHN AUSTIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: John Murray. 1861.

The life of John Austin offers peculiar difficulties to the student of character. He was gifted with extraordinary powers of mind, capable of mastering all the stores of classical and philosophical literature, and endowed with a retentive memory which yet was quite subsidiary to his critical judgment. Impelled by taste to investigate the most secret depths of the science of jurisprudence, and qualified in every sense to exercise that taste to the satisfaction of himself and to the great benefit of his fellow creatures, after giving to the world a few chapters introductory of his anticipated researches in the Province of Jurisprudence and suggestive of the rich veins of science to be there explored, he turned away from the brilliant prospect which he had just revealed to view, and ceased for ever from his labours at the moment when he appeared on the eve of most important discoveries. He beheld from a distance the riches of the promised land, which from some unaccountable reason he was destined never to enter. Mr. Austin published "The Province of Jurisprudence Determined" in 1832, and died in 1860, in the seventieth year of his age, not only without having made any further attempt to advance his favourite science, but having persistently refused to sanction a reprint of the work by which alone the world could become acquainted with his philosophy. The peculiarities of temperament which blighted the fruit of so great learning and genius are among the secrets of private life, and can be fully judged of only by his most intimate friends. The preface to the present edition, written in the most affectionate and reverent terms by his widow, though supplying many interesting particulars, serves rather as an apology than an explanation. The object of the writer is stated to have been "to show what were the circumstances by which he was forced out of the track on which he had entered, and in which his whole mind and soul were engaged; and why it was that he seemed to abandon the science to which he had devoted his singular powers with so much ardour and intensity."

Mr. Austin, it appears, disappointed the expectations of his legal friends, who confidently predicted for him the highest honours of his profession. His diffident and nervous temperament, combined with his scrupulous habit of thought, totally unfitted him for the rough and ready disputations and practice of the bar. This failure, however, caused him but little regret; for his faculties, though unsuited for business, were especially adapted to the study of his choice. In the chair of Jurisprudence at University College, he obtained a position congenial above all others to his peculiar tastes and talents; and how efficiently he filled the office his published course of lectures abundantly testify. He here fully estimated the value of being compelled by the requirements of his duty to reduce philosophical speculations to the test of clear and intelligible exposition. Another opening was subsequently afforded him as lecturer on jurisprudence at the Inner Temple. But the English school of jurisprudence proved to be a school only in name. The emoluments of its professors, dependent on the fees of the students, were inadequate to secure the required leisure of the professor; and poverty, it is alleged, in Mr. Austin's case compelled a retirement to the continent, and operated as an insuperable obstacle to the exercise of his peculiar talents and to the progress of his studies. "Slow rises worth by poverty depressed." The writer of that line, however, was an eminent instance of how surely, though slowly, worth can force its way through poverty, and how, where talents are invested with the pride of self-consciousness, poverty may operate more forcibly to animate than to hinder. The consciousness of weighty matter, and the feeling of its unsuitableness to a practical world, appear to have rather oppressed than animated Mr. Austin; and, if he did not abandon his chosen vocation in despair, he appears at least to have thought it useless to endeavour to assimilate his philosophy to the requirements of the world. Yet the fame of his teaching might have satisfied his ambition; the select band of pupils, comprising the names of Lord Clarendon, Mr. C. F. Villiers, Sir G. C. Lewis, and Lord Belper, might have animated his zeal; the rapid sale of the first edition of his work, and the earnest and repeated solicitations both from friends and strangers for a second, might have given fair promise of remuneration; and these circumstances combined might have shown that even as a teacher of jurisprudence he had some ground for hope. It is quite true, however, that the lectureships on jurisprudence in this country, which would exact the labour and thought of a life for their adequate fulfilment, are endowed in the same scale with the mere journeyman work of lectures on practical law, the materials of which are ready to every hand. Moreover, the absolute requirements of the profession create a demand for the latter, and ensure a support which the mere abstract love of science cannot be expected to equal. If it be really the case that Mr. Austin was diverted by the small emoluments of his office from exercising his noble faculties in that vocation for which he was so pre-eminently fitted, we are now suffering the irreparable consequences of an unworthy treatment of one of the most important branches of science.

The following passage from the preface offers, at least, a more adequate kind of explanation of Mr. Austin's abandonment of his researches in the province of jurisprudence:—"It was this very ardour and intensity, this entire absorption in his subject, which rendered it impossible to him to resume, at any given moment, trains of thought from which his mind had been forcibly diverted. It belonged to the nature of his mind to grapple with a question with difficulty, almost with reluctance. It seemed as if he had a sort of dread of the labour and tension to which, when it had once taken hold on him, it would inevitably subject him. . . . He could work out a subject requiring the utmost stretch of the human faculties, with a clearness and completeness that have rarely been equalled. But he had no mental agility. When he gave himself up to an inquiry, it mastered him like an overwhelming passion. And for the same reason, when his mind had once loosened its grasp of a subject, it could with difficulty recover its hold." Mr. Austin appears to have possessed powers of concentration in a high degree, but to have found great difficulty and reluctance in their exercise. May this not have arisen in some measure from the want of sufficiently definite material to employ them upon? The practical side of his mind seems to have been deficient in many respects. The world, as he found it, seems to have been thought unworthy of the application of his philosophy. If he had dispensed his speculations more abundantly, it is probable, from the style of the example before us, that it would have required a long intermediate process to assimilate it to the public digestion. Doubtless, the prophet must occasionally retire into the wilderness to foster the germs of inspiration; but he must keep alive his connection and sympathy with men of worldly minds, in order to convey to them his revelations in an intelligible and profitable manner. If we agree with Mrs. Austin, that "there was no one to do the work he could have done, as an expounder of the philosophy of law," we the more fully concur with the regret expressed by Guizot, "Quel dommage qu'il n'ait pas un employeur tout ce qu'il avait, et montror tout ce qu'il valait!"

The present volume, besides the interesting preface by Mrs. Austin, alluded to above, contains what has been so long desired by all lovers of legal philosophy, and which the author's death has alone at length rendered possible, a reprint of "The Province of Jurisprudence Determined," comprising the preliminary lectures delivered at University College, together with the outline of a course extending over the whole of jurisprudence, of which the lectures published form the first item. There remain unprinted, of Mr. Austin's labours, the rest of the lectures at University College, the short course delivered at the Inner Temple, and some other fragments relating to jurisprudence; these are promised in, as nearly as possible, the same state in which their author left them, in a succeeding volume.

In studying Mr. Austin's philosophy of law, it should now be remembered that he wrote at a time when the doctrines of Bentham were in the highest favour, and may be said to have become the current philosophy of the day. At least, the feeling of antagonism to that system, though widely spread, was not prepared with any definite scheme to oppose it. Mr. Austin was the first occupant of the chair of jurisprudence in an institution avowedly designed to extend the Benthamite spirit of thought throughout all branches of philosophy. Mr. Austin was animated with a fervent zeal in the cause, and enforced the principles of the school with a strictness, and carried them to an extent, which even the master himself does not seem to have contemplated. Mr. Austin, therefore, appears as an eminently scholastic teacher, with little tolerance for the variances of rival theorists. His style of writing rather betokens the expectancy of opposition, and is calculated to defy it. His positions are laid down with every defensive precaution, and within their limits appear unassailable. But their very limitations are, in one sense, their defect, as leaving unexplored a vast territory filled with questions of the deepest interest, and from which speculation cannot be excluded. His views are bounded by the horizon of human vision, in the sense of an exclusion for all practical application of everything beyond, and his edifice is restricted to foundations based on experiences which are too palpable to be denied.

It may prove interesting to recall to mind the leading doctrines of Mr. Austin's philosophy. Superiority signifies might, the power of affecting inferiors with evil or pain, and of forcing them, through fear of that evil, to obey the commands of the superior. God is emphatically the superior of man, because His power of affecting with pain, and forcing a compliance with His will, is unbounded and resistless. A command which obliges through fear of the evil is a law; the evil is the sanction. Bentham had extended the term sanction to conditional good as well as to conditional evil, to reward as well as to punishment; but in this it seems he is too indulgent to human weakness; and Mr. Austin, notwithstanding his habitual veneration for Bentham, finds this extension of the term "pregnant with confusion and perplexity." The only laws, strictly so called, that is to say, which satisfy the above definition, are the laws of God, and some human laws; all other applications of the term law are improper, analogical, or metaphorical.

Of the divine laws some are revealed; the word of God, signified, through the medium of language uttered by God, directly or by servants sent by Him to announce them. Others of the Divine laws are unrevealed. The index of the Divine laws which are not the subject of revelation, has been explained according to various theories, which may be referred to two general sources; the one based on a moral sense, practical reason, common sense, &c., according to the various ways of expressing it; the other, the theory of the greatest human utility or happiness. A principal object of Mr. Austin's work is to denounce the former set of theories, and to uphold the latter. According to him the benevolence of God, combined with the principles of general utility, is our only index to His unrevealed law. God in His benevolence designs the happiness of his creatures, and, accordingly, enjoins or forbids actions according to their tendencies. Man, by his judgment concerning the tendencies of his actions, discerns the commands of God.

It remains to ascertain the test or index of human laws. One of the essentials imported in a command, and therefore in a law is that it flows from a certain determinate source, either a single rational being or a determinate body of rational beings. Laws deficient in this essential are so called improperly and by analogy only. Mr. Austin considers that the laws of God as explained above sufficiently satisfy this requirement. Human laws, on the other hand, are tested and distinguished according to the sources from which they spring; and therefore it becomes necessary to analyse these sources with precision. This may be called the second principal object of Mr. Austin's work. He expounds at great length, and with much elaboration of detail, the distinguishing marks of sovereignty and independent political society. The essential character of a positive law, strictly so called, is that it is a command emanating from the sovereignty to members of the independent political society wherein its author is supreme. Positive laws satisfying this condition constitute the province of jurisprudence, and the final object of the work—to determine this province—is thus accomplished. Laws so called improperly, in consequence of analogies or likenesses more or less striking to laws properly so called, do not satisfy strictly the above requirements, and are mentioned and explained for the purpose of distinction. They comprise laws set by indeterminate bodies and laws with imperfect sanctions—as the moral law, the law of general opinion, the laws of honour and of fashion. The science of jurisprudence is concerned with positive laws without regard to their goodness or badness; and the divine law and positive law are not otherwise connected than inasmuch as the former is the standard to which the latter ought to conform in respect of quality.

The above sketch gives but a faint idea of Mr. Austin's work, in the course of which he undertakes to analyse and denote by their essential differences all the practical meanings which pass under the name of law. This he accomplishes with much exactness of observation and accuracy of language; and if occasionally unusual he is always clear and unmistakable. He examines with painful minuteness the external conditions of laws by which they manifest themselves to our experience, and thus attains an empiric generalisation of laws into classes of marked characteristics. He does not pass beyond this into the region of theory, or attempt an induction from the results thus collected of any a priori necessary principles; and, indeed, the impression left by a perusal of his work is rather that he considers any attempts of the kind to be vain and useless. The province of jurisprudence is determined, and determined by definite landmarks; but into the creative source of jurisprudence and the original development and settlement of its province we are not invited to inquire.

Yet on reviewing his work we cannot fail to be struck with some very strong assumptions of a strictly a priori character, assumptions quite as arbitrary as the much abused moral sense or practical reason. The Divine laws, we have seen, are tested by their material results—they are the dictates of utility; while human laws are tested by their source—they are the command of the determinate body which satisfies the conditions of political sovereignty, and are attended by the material sanctions of legal compulsion. Of the former we have no empirical test in respect of their source, or of their sanction. Indeed, Mr. Austin's doctrines of divine law, though under the guise of fact, or at least of assertion, are matters of pure theory. Thus, it is matter of theory that the source of divine commands is certain and determinate; that the Creator wishes and designs the utility and happiness of His creatures in this world; that human experience of the tendencies of actions is the index of His commands, and that He affects these commands with a sanction of threatened evil. This theory, judged by Mr. Austin's principles of adhering strictly to the indications of fact, stands out as mere assumption, and one of the boldest kind. The only matter of fact upon which it rests is that men can test the useful or pernicious tendencies of their actions by experience; and if Mr. Austin had left the principle of utility to stand on its own basis of human experience, he would have been more consistent, perhaps at the risk of being mistaken or opposed by the general sentiments respecting religion. To say that human experience discovers the laws of God is equivalent, in the absence of some à priori explanation, to saying that man imposes these laws, and the additional conception of God as a test of the law, is therefore useless. Mr. Austin's doctrine of the sanctions of Divine law, in particular, is carefully abstracted from all basis of experience. Bentham found a physical or natural sanction for the dictates of general utility in the actual consequences which certainly followed a deviation from them. These consequences, according to Mr. Austin, follow as mere natural effects, and are not suffered as the consequences of not complying with the desires of an intelligent rational being; therefore, they do not satisfy his criterion of a law proper, and can be called sanctions only in a metaphorical sense. Hence Mr. Austin's doctrine of a Divine sanction or threatened evil is a matter of pure faith; and when he states that the Divine law and the human civil law equally satisfy his definition of a law proper, the term sanction, as annexed to the former, points to something very different in kind from the palpable fine, imprisonment, and compulsion which attends upon infringements of the latter. Again, the part of the theory which assumes that the design of the Creator is directed to the ultimate happiness of mankind in this world is far from being generally conceded; some of the greatest philosophers of ancient and modern times have felt so little satisfied that the present order of things can designedly or possibly tend ultimately to human happiness, that they have felt that the hopeless prospect of reconciling the incongruities of fortune in this life constituted one of the strongest arguments of a future state of ultimate perfectibility, which must be taken into account combinedly with, if not independently of, the present state.

The following passage may be quoted as a specimen of Mr. Austin's views on the points here referred to:—"The divine laws may be styled good in the sense with which the atheist may apply the epithet to human. We may style them good or worthy of praise inasmuch as they agree with utility considered as an ultimate test. And this is the only meaning with which we can apply the epithet to the laws of God. Unless we refer them to utility considered as an ultimate test, we have no test by which we can try them. If the laws set by the Deity were not generally useful, or if they did not promote the general happiness of His creatures, or if their great author were not wise and benevolent, they would not be good or worthy of praise, but were devilish and worthy of execration."

Mr. Austin's style of composition, though laboured with the utmost care and circumspection with the view of guarding the matter from all risk of ambiguity, is, as is well known, studiously negligent of any arrangement or grace which might facilitate its reception by the reader. The nature of his task—that of analysing and disavowing the minute shades of distinction which lie concealed in popular language—is, to a great extent, a justification; but his style or manner of writing, and perhaps of thinking, appears to have become habitual, and to have been carried beyond what was necessary to serve the purposes of accuracy. The usual modes of abbreviating discourse by the use of pronouns, conjunctions, and adverbs, and by elliptical expressions, are sedulously avoided; and long repetitions and periphrases are employed instead. The reader is never credited with the capacity of observing the most obvious differences, conducting the simplest train of thought, or carrying on the argument a single step. The plainest distinctions are carefully explained, and every new position is approached by a full and guarded review of all the preliminary steps.

Mr. Austin's tone towards dissentients from his opinions is calculated to afford yet more serious ground of offence. Those whose views do not coincide with his on certain points belong to the family of "Noodle," and are members of "the formidable confederacy of fools." Montesquieu's exposition of law as an universal conception, is pronounced "incomparably more obscure than the term which it affects to expound." Hooker's sublime opening chapter on law is disposed of as "fustian." It really seems to us, however, just as philosophical to adopt, as these great writers have done, uniformity of action as the essential characteristic of law, and to consider moral and political laws as metaphorical uses of the term, by reason of the mere tendency to uniformity through the imperfection of human obedience, as to consider, with Mr. Austin, the latter the strict use of the term, and the former as the metaphor, upon precisely the same ground of resemblance in uniformity. The term law is certainly used in both senses, and perhaps sometimes not without the latent idea that the two senses may ultimately coincide; but in the meanwhile, even "noodle" comprehends the distinction, and no elaborate disquisition is necessary to explain it. The objections raised to the definitions of sovereignty given by Grotius and by Bentham may be pointed to as another instance of this spirit in the author. Bentham defines sovereignty by the habitual obedience of subjects; Grotius, by the independence of superior command. Mr. Austin avails himself of the two elements in combination to form a complete definition, but objects to each on account of its oneness. When we remember, however, that Bentham treated of the relations between sovereigns and subjects, and Grotius of the relations between different independent sovereignties, we find that each defines the conception accurately and sufficiently in respect of the quality for which he employed it, properly rejecting the other qualities by which it might be distinguished as superfluous for the occasion. Mr. Austin's objection, therefore, seems captious; and it certainly is not worthy of a philosopher to draw unnecessary distinctions, or to quibble about mere words, where the sense is not at stake.

While we have ventured to point out a few questionable points in Mr. Austin's doctrine and in the manner and spirit of his writing, we wish to pay a full tribute of acknowledgment to the substantial merits of his work. It is a very important step in the philosophy of law. Here are laid out with the most critical accuracy of description all the materials and facts, so to speak, of which the province of jurisprudence is composed. Their external form and condition are presented to view with a plainness which cannot be mistaken, and a reality which cannot be denied. Sovereignty is the test of positive law, and a most complete and interesting analysis of sovereignty is given. Whoever seeks to establish a theory of jurisprudence must first become thoroughly acquainted with the facts thus presented to his observation; he must build within the limits of this foundation: and his theory must adequately account for all the phenomena here presented, or it must be rejected as inadmissible.

LONDON AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The annual general meeting of this society was held on Saturday, the 20th instant, Mr. Hope Scott, Q.C., in the chair. The report of the directors to the Annual General Meeting stated that during the year 1860, 179 policies were issued, assuring the sum of £220,640—the premiums upon which amounted to £8,296 2s. 10d. Nine of these policies, assuring £27,200, were effected against special contingencies, by payment of single premiums amounting to £2,132 17s. 6d. The remaining policies represented a new annual premium income of upwards of £6,000, which exceeded that of any former year. The average amount of the new policies exceeded £1,200, proving the high class of business transacted by the society. The claims paid during the past year were twelve in number, amounting, inclusive of bonuses, to £16,826, of which upwards of £5,000 had accrued during the year 1859. Against these claims was to be set off a sum of £750 received under a re-assurance policy. The society's income during the past year exceeded £47,000, and the assets had been augmented by a sum of very nearly £19,000.

The report was unanimously adopted.

The directors and auditors retiring by rotation having been re-elected, the meeting was made "extraordinary" for the purpose of declaring a bonus for the year 1860.

The report of the directors prepared for the Extraordinary General Meeting stated that the first division of profits embraced a period of ten years; the present was in respect of five years only; and the future divisions would also be quinquennial. The new premiums received during the last five years had amounted to £26,138 14s. 11d., being at the rate of £5,227 15s. per annum. The total new premiums in the previous ten years amounted to £29,191 7s. 10d., being at the rate of £2,919 2s. 10d. per annum. The renewal premiums amounted in the five years to £120,662 5s. 6d. The claims paid on policies had amounted altogether to £74,401 11s. 3d., of which the sum of £53,534 14s. was paid during the past five years. The total number of policies issued from the foundation of the society to the 31st December last, was 1,667, assuring £1,675,276 16s. 10d., at annual premiums amounting altogether to £50,269 17s. 1d. The policies remaining in force were 1,094, assuring £1,158,030 15s. 8d., and contingent annuities for £905 per annum. The annuity business of the society had been profitable, though not very extensive. Of twenty-five annuities, amounting altogether to £1,480 9s. 8d., eleven for £584 0s. 11d. had fallen in, leaving in force fourteen annuities, amounting to £896 8s. 9d. The investments of the society produce an average rate of interest of £4 10s. 4d. per cent. The balance sheet annexed to the report showed that the total assets amounted to £237,300 7s. 7d.; that the Proprietors' Fund amounted to £67,003 3s. 7d.; that the present value of liabilities under policies and annuity contracts was £121,881 19s. The total amount of profits then divisible was £42,785 6s. 10d. Of this last sum, according to the provisions of the deed of settlement, one-fifth, or £8,557 1s. 2d., would be added to the Proprietors' Fund, which would be increased thereby to £75,560 4s. 9d. This was equivalent to an addition of 9s. 4d. per share, which would make the amount considered as paid up in respect of each share £4 1s. 10d. During the last five years the proprietors have received 3s. per share in each year—being $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on their original paid up capital of £2 per share. The annual dividend during the next five years, arising from the interest of the Proprietors' Fund, would be at the rate of 3s. 8d. per share—or 9 per cent. upon the original paid up capital. The remaining four-fifths of the divisible surplus, being the sum of £34,228 4s. 8d., belong to the assured, and, according to the provisions of the deed of settlement, would be added in the form of equivalent reversionary bonuses to the policies entitled to participate in profits. The total amount of the reversionary bonuses would be about £55,000, equivalent on an average to 52 per cent. on the premiums paid upon the participating policies during the quinquennial period. The reversionary bonuses might be commuted for an equivalent present cash payment, or for a reduction of the future premiums. The directors also offer to the assured the option of the extinction of all premiums at some future age, which it was hoped would be agreeable to many of the assured.

This report was unanimously adopted.

Votes of thanks to the board of directors and to the chairman having been passed, the proceedings of the meeting terminated.

CONCENTRATION OF COURTS OF JUSTICE.

With reference to the plan of the Attorney-General, for concentrating all the courts of justice—Law, Equity, Divorce, Probate, and others—in one place, the Observer of the 14th instant remarks that our building operations have never attained much success. The old courts of law, the Houses of Parliament, the British Museum, the National Gallery, the Post Office, and other buildings that could be named, have not been found very appropriate or adequate for the purposes for which they were intended. There is some danger that Sir Richard Bethell may be constrained to propose a plan of an inferior or less costly description, if he be not reinforced by public opinion, and by the warm support of the more intelligent members of the House of Commons. It will not do to erect a building simply to last our time, and to encumber the earth afterwards. As the funds of the court are to be burthened—at least in the first instance—with the payment, our posterity should have the advantage as well as the cost of the erection. In the present state of our judicial arrangements we have no great facilities for instruction in legal science. The basis of our operations, and the operations themselves, of our municipal code, are dependent more than is supposed upon a knowledge of the law of nature, the law of nations, and constitutional law—the law civil and the law general affect all other branches of the law of modern constructions in all its phases and relations. Some time ago a paper was read before the Law Amendment Society, propounding a scheme for a Law University of a very practical kind, and making reasonable propositions of compromise to meet the claims and jealousies, the pride and prejudice, of existing institutions. It was shown that a comprehensive legal education was necessary, not for lawyers only, but for all classes of statesmen, magistrates, officers abroad and at home, in foreign countries and in the colonies, and how a proper knowledge might often have saved us from many difficulties and escapades into which we have been brought by the too common ignorance of our employes. It is not too much to ask that in the proposed architectural arrangements a corner may be found for the use of professors and of those employed in the teaching of the law. The plan of incorporating the Inns of Court and the Law Society into a Legal University is worthy of consideration. There are abundance of funds applicable to such a purpose, and a large amount of property wasted on personal objects in a manner not unworthy of the London Corporation itself. The Inns of Court have vast libraries that might be made available, and halls that could be turned to some better account than discussing the usual number of dinners and the legal modicum of port wine. A general library, comprising a comprehensive and systematic collection of law books, would assist in establishing the materials and basis of a general consolidation of the law, and in the mean time form a good substitute for a want that is so generally felt. Such a concentration would also tend to bring together the men practising in the different courts, who now seldom meet on common ground, for the courts and offices are spread all over the town, and the authority of Westminster Hall is narrowed within bounds quite incommensurate with the demands of modern times. The system of meeting at dinner in so many various halls is sadly at variance with the usages and conveniences of modern times. It is good so far as it goes, but it does not go the length of concentrating or of instructing. The men who govern, and who administer justice, should be something more than nisi prius lawyers, pleaders, or conveyancers. These considerations ought to have some weight in the proposed arrangements, as well as the more obvious and practical necessity of bringing all the offices connected with the practice of the law round a central locality. The great increase of business, and the crowded state of the streets, render such a concentration necessary, to say nothing of the chances of improving the architectural beauty of the great metropolis, and pulling down the unsightly obstruction of Temple Bar. Sir Richard Bethell has added much to his fame as a statesman and jurist by his efforts to procure the fusion of law and equity, and he will do much to regenerate both by bringing them together in a noble pile of buildings, constructed for moral as well as material effect. The several failures already made in modern London architecture forbid us to be too sanguine. But if a site sufficiently capacious can be cleared between Fleet-street and Lincoln's Inn, and the enterprise entrusted to able and intelligent hands, we do not despair of seeing a series of unique and convenient buildings, that will be an ornament to the locality, and a great convenience to the practitioners and the public. If, in addition to these obvious advantages, a provision can be made hereafter for a higher class of legal and general education, a still nobler and more lasting result will be accomplished in a manner the most natural and just.

BILLS IN PARLIAMENT

FOR THE FORMATION OF NEW LINES OF RAILWAY IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

The following Railway Bills have passed through committee in the House of Commons:—

KEADLEY EXTENSION.
MOLD AND DENBIGH JUNCTION.
RHYL HARBOUR BRIDGE AND RAILWAY.
VALE OF CLWYD.

The following Bill has passed through committee in the House of Lords:—

RUMNEY RAILWAY.

The preamble of the following Bill has been proved in committee in the House of Commons:—

OSWESTRY, ELLESMERE, AND WHITCHURCH.

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. EDWARD BURKITT.—We have always felt a very great pleasure in announcing any honour conferred upon, or testimonial presented to, any member of the profession; and we would take this opportunity of requesting the favour of communications from our readers, of any particulars respecting such an interesting subject. A short time since the markets committee of the corporation of London presented to Mr. Edward Burkitt, of Curriers' Hall, solicitor, their late chairman, a very elegant French dining-room clock, striking the hours and half hours, with escapement in front. The clock is set in a black marble case, inlaid with malachite, which bears the following inscription:—"Presented to Edward Burkitt, Esq., by the Markets Committee of the Corporation of London, as a mark of their respect and esteem for the able and judicious manner in which he performed the duties of chairman of that committee, the zeal and ability, the firmness and impartiality he displayed in conducting the business, and his kind, courteous, and friendly demeanour upon all occasions."

The Right Hon. Sir George Grey, Bart., M.P., Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, with the approval of her Majesty, has been pleased to appoint Henry Wyndham West, Esq., to the important and responsible office of Attorney-General of the Duchy Court of Lancaster, vacant by the death of Thomas F. Ellis, Esq. Mr. West (who is the eldest son of Martin John West, Esq., commissioner in bankruptcy for the Leeds district and recorder of Lynn), has been for some years revising barrister for the West Riding of Yorkshire, is recorder of Scarborough, and junior counsel to the Admiralty. We have much pleasure in recording the appointment, as he is also a citizen of London, and like Mr Lush, Q.C., and various other members of the Bar, a liveryman of the Carriers' Company.—City Press.

CURRENT TOPICS.

The lengthened debate on the Budget in the House of Commons has postponed nearly all those measures before Parliament which are interesting to lawyers. Almost the only exception is, however, the most important measure of all. The Bankruptcy Bill, having passed the House of Commons, is at present out of the region of political strife, and has to contend, in the House of Lords, with such difficulties only as inherently belong to it. In a Parliamentary paper which has just been issued we find that the Lord Chancellor has given notice of a number of amendments, most of which, however, are of a merely formal character; but Lord Chelmsford, in the same paper, signifies his intention to move a number of amendments, the mere notice of which occupies five pages, so that at all events there will probably be considerable delay before the measure is ready to receive the Royal sanction. Indeed, now that the rumour of the Bill being referred to a select committee, which we announced last week as not being improbable, has turned out to be true, it becomes somewhat doubtful whether, after all, the Bill may not eventually share the fate of its predecessor of last session.

Lord St. Leonards' Constructive Notice Bill has for the present yielded to the opposition which it has met from some lawyers in the House of Commons, and stands referred to a select committee of that House.

The Bill on Fraudulent Trade Marks has been postponed longer than was expected, by the debates on the Budget. There is little doubt, however, of its becoming law in the course of a week or two; and we shall commence in our next number a series of papers upon the law of trade marks generally, with the view of elucidating a subject of great interest to the mercantile community as well as to lawyers in the manufacturing districts.

Mr. Hodgkinson's Recovery of Debts Bill has met the fate which we predicted for it when it was introduced to Parliament. We altogether agree with the observations made by Mr. Walpole, on Wednesday, upon Lord St. Leonards' Constructive Notice Bill, as to the necessity for the consideration by the law officers of the Crown of all Bills affecting the administration of the law, before they are introduced to Parliament. There is something so manifestly absurd in the attempt of a private member like Mr. Hodgkinson to revolutionize the proceedings in actions at law, that the wonder is how the absurdity remained undiscovered until the Bill had arrived at the stage of going into committee. Mr. Hodgkinson stated his object to be the prevention of frivolous and fictitious defences to actions for the recovery of debts, and for this purpose he proposed to enable the plaintiff to prevent the defendant from even entering an appearance until he had made an affidavit that he had a good defence to the action, or some part of it, or had obtained leave from a judge at chambers to defend it. The effect of the Bill, if it became law, would unquestionably have been to increase very unnecessarily the cost of litigation, and the chances in favour of dishonest plaintiffs; while it would have placed no impediment whatever in the way of unscrupulous defendants, who would seldom make much difficulty in swearing that they believed they had a good defence either of fact or law—meaning only by the latter such as might succeed in the final result.

The Attorney-General has so frequently placed upon the notice paper of the House of Commons a notice of his intention to introduce a Bill having for its object the concentration of all our courts of law, and the appropriation of a fund for the purchase of a site, and the erection of buildings, that we begin to despair of even seeing the Bill in print before the end of the Session, although the Times of Thursday last came out with an article strongly in favour of the project, and also of Lincoln's-inn-fields "as the natural site for this national edifice." Our readers are already in possession of whatever can be said in favour of this site as opposed to that recommended by the Commissioners' Report, and preferred by the Office of Works. A Bill which may be regarded as preliminary to Sir Richard Bethell's measure, has been brought in by Mr. Cowper, the Chief Commissioner of Works, to enable the Commissioners to acquire a site for the new palace of justice—the question of the particular site being left in abeyance. The Bill is merely intended as a formal forerunner of the measure which is to be propounded to the House by Sir Richard Bethell. The site of Lincoln's-inn-fields has found a very able and uncompromising advocate in Mr. Harvey Gem, but the great majority of the metropolitan members of the profession—as far as we have the means of judging—are decidedly in favour of the site facing the Law Institution, and extending from Lincoln's-inn to the Strand. We agree with the Times, that whatever is to be done should be done quickly, as there has been already quite as much consideration and discussion of the subject as it can possibly require.

A private meeting of the leading members of the Bar and Benchers of the Inner Temple was held on the 30th ult., in the Library Room, Westminster Hall, to take into consideration the present position of Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., and his relation to the bar. There was a very numerous attendance of Queen's Counsel, but the result of their deliberations was not allowed to transpire.

LORD KINGSDOWN'S BILL RELATING TO WILLS OF PERSONALTY.

The rule of English law which requires that the will of a British subject should, as to the personalty comprised in it, conform to the law of the domicile of the testator at the period of his death, although abundantly fruitful of inconveniences, would have been perhaps a still more prolific source of abnormal results as to the devolution of the property of testators with a foreign domicile, if the exclusive jurisdiction as to wills of personal estate had not been from a very remote period exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts in England. These courts administered justice according to the rules of the canon and the civil law, and not according to those of the common law. The canon and the civil law form a large portion of the juridical system of the continent; while in Sweden and Norway Ecclesiastical Courts have an exclusive jurisdiction over all testamentary causes. The great and common influence of the canon and civil law upon the jurisprudence of the continent and our own, as to questions of moral duty, intention, relationship, and personal status, and especially as to the mode in which personality should be transmitted upon the death of its owner, has thus, in a great measure, deprived the law of domicile of those anomalous results which an extension of the same law to realty would have certainly produced. The natural feelings of affection for relatives, and the boundaries of degrees of kindred, have also tended to mould the jurisprudence of personal rights, both on the continent and in England, so that these do not require the sweeping reforms which the doctrines of tenure have so often urgently demanded. Although, therefore, our law, in construing a will made abroad, regards only the domicile of the testator, while the different countries in Europe take into account not only the law of such domicile, but also the law of the place where the will is executed, yet the actual complications which have arisen by reason of this conflict of laws would probably have been much more intricate but for these features of resemblance to each other which the civil law has impressed upon the testamentary laws of every state in Europe. The devolution of personality, upon the intestacy of its owner, is adjusted in general throughout Europe on principles not very different from those which regulate its administration in like cases in England. The comparative facility with which the law of personal property may be dealt with may be illustrated by the following brief review of its development as regards title by relationship or by will.

At common law the subject had power to dispose only of one-third of his personality, in case he left a wife and issue. The widow was entitled, as of inalienable right, to a third, and the children, in like manner, to the remaining third. If the testator left either his wife or children, but not both, surviving him, then he could dispose of a moiety of his personal estate. This law or custom, which was at first general, became, in the course of time, confined to a few districts, from which it was finally expelled by various statutes; Wales, the province of York, and the City of London being the last to which this change was extended. An oral, or, as it was termed, a nuncupative, will was sufficient, without any writing, to bequeath personal estate, including chattels real, until the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) placed nuncupative wills, if they comprised personal estate of upwards of £30 in value, under so many restrictions that from that period they gradually fell into disuse. The last Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26) has rendered all nuncupative wills invalid except those made by soldiers or mariners, and has prescribed the same forms of execution, as also similar rules of construction, for all wills alike, whether they relate to realty or to personality. The formalities which were always necessary for wills of realty were owing to their statutory origin, no devise of lands being valid at common law. When the Statute of Wills (32 Hen. 8, c. 1) conferred, and the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3) confirmed, the power of devising lands, these statutes necessarily determined the mode in which alone such a power could be exercised. But bequests of personality having been always allowed—at least, to the extent we have stated—prior to the period mentioned, no document was necessary for such gifts.

As personality is supposed capable of following the person of its owner in a manner that immoveable estate does not admit of, it has been always treated by jurists as regulated by the law of the domicile of the owner, and by the personal status conferred upon him by such domicile, and not by the lex loci rei sitæ, unless so far as the forms of process of the latter country require a strict conformity to their provisions. This rule of international law is applicable to contracts inter vivos, as well as to wills relating to personality. The law of domicile has been thus so readily established in the comity of nations by reason, perhaps, of the comparative inferiority, both in value and political importance, of personal property as compared with realty in feudal times. Each country willingly suffered the personality within it to be obedient in this respect to foreign law; since, in so doing, it was cutting off no source of revenue of its own—land at that period bearing, with the exception of heriots, all political and seignorial burdens. But now that legacy duty is made a source of revenue, a consideration of the law of domicile is not without its attractions, for the statesman as well as for the international jurist. The similarity between foreign customs and our own as to the course of the transmission of personal property upon the intestacy of the owner—and, consequently (as express dispositions frequently follow something like the order indicated by law and custom) by his will also—has probably been one of the causes to which an inattention to the unsatisfactory state of the law of domicile is to be ascribed. But the main cause of the omission of this law from all programmes of reform is to be attributed to the recent origin of the state of facts which now so urgently demands a change of this law, both as regards testamentary and consensual rights. Forty years ago, the number of British subjects who resided, or even travelled, abroad was not very considerable. But at the present day the number of British subjects resident or travelling abroad is very considerable indeed. The attention of the Legislature, therefore, has not been too soon directed to the mischievous operation of the law of domicile upon wills relating to personal estate.

Domicile may be defined to be a permanent residence—the home in which a person keeps his heirlooms, if he has any, and all the indicia that such is the residence which he wishes to be considered as his official, political, commercial, or social abode. Actual residence with an intent to continue such occupation are, therefore, essential elements of the idea of domicile. But even the bare fact of residence may not in all cases be readily determined so as to afford grounds for applying the law. A gentleman may have various residences on either side of the Tweed, and, like the Lord Chancellor of England, be in doubt in what manner he ought to contract marriage, or make his will, so as to alter the distribution which the law might otherwise possibly make of his property. Lucanus an Appulus anceps: the Lord Chancellor recently declared in the House of Lords, with an apparent appreciation of the mazes of the legal Babylon over which he presides, that he did not know whether his domicile was in London or in North Britain. There is really room to doubt whether Lord Campbell is not merely on a visit with us as far as domicile is concerned. The Chancellor, Cancellarius, is supposed, indeed, to attend the person of the Sovereign; but such an attendance must not be conclusively presumed to be given at all times, like that of the Lord Chief Justice of England, at Westminster. The mere fact of being a member of the Government would, doubtless, be held not sufficient to determine the place of domicile of such member. If the very poor man have no home, the rich man's home is, on the other hand, sometimes equally uncertain. The main cause of complication in this branch of law, however, is not the difficulty of proving the fact of residence, but the intention to remain. Proof of an intention is always extremely difficult, especially if the intention is to be regarded not as a motive to do a direct act, but the result of a preference, choice, or predilection, which may be influenced by so many circumstances. The reader is aware of the great and varied litigation which has been occasioned by the regard which the law shows to the intention of testators as a means of construing the written instrument.

In questions of domicile the Court is often obliged to review the whole career of a life, its leading and its petty incidents. After perusing some of the cases which illustrate the complexity of this law, and which have more of interest than of edification as to its juridical completeness, the reader may be tempted to consider this law of domicile as merely an effort to give to "airy nothing a local habitation and a name." Lord Kingsdown on introducing his Bill, stated that the preliminary expense of determining the question of domicile in Lord v. Colvin, 7 W. R. 251, amounted to £30,000, and that the validity of the will itself was not yet determined. In Bremer v. Freeman, a lady, the daughter of a gentleman who had amassed a large fortune in India, married an Italian gentleman. She went to France in 1842, and in her will which she made there according to the English form, bequeathed a legacy of £10,000 to a person named Freeman. At the time when she made this will her domicile was English, and her will, consequently, good in English law. But it was contended that she subsequently acquired a domicile in Italy, and afterwards in France. The questions raised were, first, whether the will had complied with the forms of the French law, as to execution, attestation, &c.; and, secondly, whether it was so worded as to pass the bequest effectually to Freeman. Eight French advocates were brought over to give evidence as to what the French law was upon this state of facts, and these differed from each other in their opinion of the case. This incident in the suit has perhaps had some influence in suggesting the Foreign Law Ascertainment Bill now before Parliament. After an aggregate expense of £5,500 the bequest was held invalid, although the intention of the testatrix admitted of no doubt.

Lord Kingsdown's Bill, which is now before Parliament, promises to remove most of the difficulties occasioned by the present law of domicile. The first section provides that every will and other testamentary instrument made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject, (whatever may be his domicile at any period), shall, as regards personality, be held to be well executed and admitted accordingly to probate in England or to confirmation in Scotland, if it be made according to the forms required either by the law of the domicile of the testator, or by the law of the place where it is executed, or by the law of any part of the United Kingdom. If then, according to this Bill, an English subject, who is domiciled in France makes in Spain a will, which bequeaths personality situated in England, probate will be granted (if the Bill becomes law), in case the will conform to the law of either of these three countries. As the law at present stands, the law of France alone is material as regards such a will. The second section provides that every will made within the United Kingdom shall be likewise deemed valid, if it be executed according to the terms required by the laws for the time in force in that part of the United Kingdom where it is made. This section appears to have been intended to preclude the assumption that has been often acted upon—of Scotland being a foreign country as regards the devolution of property by the will, or upon the death, of its owner. The third section provides that no will shall be revoked or become invalid by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same. This section will prevent a will once valid according to the Act, as, for instance, a will made under the circumstances mentioned in Bremer v. Freeman, from being defeated, as might be the case at present, if the testator's domicile at the time of his death was in Russia or Naples. The fourth section provides that the Act is not to invalidate any will which would have been valid if this Bill had not become law, except as such will or other testamentary instrument may be revoked or altered by any subsequent will, &c., made valid by this Act. The fifth section declares that the Act is to have no retrospective operation.

The reader will observe that this Bill will render the future law of England still more pliant than that of Continental Europe. The latter admits only the law of the domicile of the testator, or of the place where the will was made, but not, it appears, the lex loci rei sitæ, as a rule of interpretation, either as to the validity or meaning of the will. This Bill renders the codes of these three districts equally conclusive standards of interpretation as to forms of execution. America, we may add, follows the present rule of English law as to wills made abroad; while Scotland adopts both the criteria allowed in the law of Continental Europe. Any will, good as to realty situated in England, will in future, if Lord Kingsdown's Bill passes, be good also as to personality; and, moreover, it may be sufficient to pass the latter description of property in cases in which it will fail to affect the realty. It is, doubtless, eminently desirable that the law of England should conform to the general law of Europe in this respect, especially as leaseholds are classed in continental jurisprudence as immovable property. Lord Wensleydale, indeed, in his place in the House of Lords denied the existence of any such international law as we have mentioned, and as was stated by Lord Kingsdown; but the merits of the Bill are independent of this question. Questions relating to domicile are likely to recur, notwithstanding this Act, as it only applies to the forms, and not to the rules of the interpretation of wills. Moreover, as regards testators who have resided for any considerable time in India, the beneficiaries under wills made by such will have a motive to show that their testators had acquired a legal domicile there, as in such cases the bequests would not be liable to legacy duty. This rule, it would appear, is not sought to be affected by the present Bill. Lord Wensleydale and Lord St. Leonards have opposed this measure, and it has only received a qualified support from the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cranworth. Lord St. Leonards expressed his disapproval of the measure upon the ground that Englishmen should not be thus encouraged in acquiring foreign domicils. A domicile, indeed, should not, and cannot legally, be changed for the fraudulent purpose of obtaining an advantage by evading the rule of law (3 Meriv. 80). But this objection applies only to acts done in direct violation of the law, and not to efforts to have inconvenient laws altered. Lord St. Leonards' objection is equally applicable to every measure of reform ever yet propounded. It would appear, on the contrary, desirable that a testator who makes his will abroad should be allowed to insert a clause in it to the effect that it should be construed, both as to its validity and meaning, according to the law of any country he might choose—or, at all events, according to the law of England. On the whole, we highly approve of Lord Kingsdown's Bill as a measure of much-needed reform, and one very likely to obviate the difficulties which it is intended to remedy.

It is a patent error to suppose that Lord Kingsdown's Bill in any way conflicts with the principles which have hitherto regulated the comity of nations. These principles have not an unbending force as regards private international law. In fact, the law of domicile itself implies that sovereign States have relinquished their natural territorial rights, and suffered personal property to be exempt from the laws of its situs, in order that a testator may not have the trouble of making himself acquainted with the laws of as many countries as he may have property situated in, or to which his commercial transactions may extend. Thus, this law is not a sacrifice of private rights to public law, but, on the contrary, it implies that sovereign States have in this respect varied their prerogatives of determining the devolution of the property situated within their respective territories, and taxing it with legacy duty, &c., in order that the intention of testators may be the more readily carried into effect. No amendment or alteration of this law can, therefore, affect the recognised prerogatives and individuality of sovereign States. Public law is regulated by very different principles, and is connected in theory with politics rather than with civil law. It sometimes, therefore, becomes necessary that nations should come to an express agreement upon rules of public law, lest any one State should ignore the rights of another. Thus the rights of neutrals were expressly guaranteed a few years ago by the treaty of Paris. But, if all States concurred in an agreement that a will should in all cases be construed according to the domicile of the testator, the result would be that all tourists should make their wills before setting out from home, unless at the imminent risk of having a will drawn according to the law of one country, and interpreted according to the law of another—of having a will drawn in Spain, for instance, interpreted according to the law of France, Italy, or England. As rays of light, when brought into direct collision with each other, may be made to produce darkness, so the result of the conflict of laws in the case we have put would be, doubtless, utter confusion, the probable invalidity of the limitations in the will, and certain expense to the beneficiaries under it. Such an international law would not be an advantage to any State, while it would be a source of direct annoyance to the subjects of each. Indeed, as the public law of Europe at present stands, the law of the domicile of the testator is not the only criterion of the validity of his will. The law of the place where it is executed is equally potent in this respect. Now, how can the law of domicile be considered as of settled international force, since it can be evaded by the sojourn of a testator for a single hour in a foreign land? That the present law of every State in Europe is to this effect admits but of little doubt. The 999th section of the Code Civile expressly recognises the law of the place where a will is executed, as well as the domicile of the testator, as a criterion of the validity of the instrument. Lord Kingsdown's statement, that the law of all Europe corresponds with this enactment, is, therefore, upon this ground, as well as its intrinsic authority, exceedingly likely to be correct. We think, therefore, that his Bill, while it cannot conflict with any international rule of policy, is eminently recommended by its positive merits.

The English Law of Domicil.

(By OLIVER STEPHEN ROUND, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn, Barrister-at-law.)

In a case such as Somerville v. Somerville, which we are now considering, of course, the evidence was the guide to determine the question, and so far as the expressions of the intestate could be collected, this was of a somewhat conflicting character, for he had been heard to regret that he was not more in Scotland, and yet spoke of his connections and education being English, and seemed to have a leaning towards England. As the case was argued, the question was made with regard to the two countries only, England and Scotland, although he had certainly resided in other countries; but that was merely whilst on service, and that seemed to be assumed to be immaterial on the question of domicile. This might be considered more the case of two equal domiciles, than of residence in various countries; but when investigated the difference of conduct with respect to each appears to be sufficiently great to bring it within the heading of this chapter, as the principle governing those cases was certainly that gone upon in this. The rules of the civil law, "Ubique Larem rerumque ac fortunarum suarum constituit," and "Eam domum unicuique nostrum debere, existimari, ubiqueque sedes et tabulas habere, suarumque rerum constitutionem faceret."—Cod. Lib. 10, tit. 39, l. 7; Dig. lib. 50, tit. 16, l. 203, were fully recognised; and Somerville House in Scotland being undoubtedly his principal establishment, Scotland was held to be his domicile. Three great rules were then laid down by the learned judge which have ever since been recognized, and are now acted upon, namely, first, that the succession to the personal estate of an intestate is to be regulated by the law of the country in which he was a domiciled inhabitant at the time of his death. Secondly, that although for some purposes there might be two domiciles, yet for the purpose of succession a man can have but one. And, thirdly, that the domicile of origin must prevail, until the party has acquired another by actual abandonment as well as acquisition. From these propositions, the following deductions flow; that in considering the domicile, the place of birth or death, or the situation of the property, does not affect the domicile, but the animus and factum. That it is absurd to suppose two domiciles to be co-existent for the purposes of succession, and that the domicile of origin, although it may be the domicile of birth, is not necessarily so.

From what has been observed, I think it follows, that whatever difficulty there may be in determining the question of domicile where the habits of the individual have been so desultory as to bring the circumstances attending his movements in many different countries into question, yet, if the principles upon which the courts act be well and clearly understood, there is little or no difficulty in applying them. Cases of this kind depend very much upon the evidence, and peculiarly require every particle of information to be brought forward that can possibly be obtained. If the evidence is sufficiently distinct and full, of course the difficulty is lessened, if it be scanty, or, as is sometimes the case, almost wholly wanting, the chief difficulty is to consider the probabiles conjecturae, as so much must necessarily be presumed, and in doing this, it often happens that there is a balance of probabilities, and no doubt very difficult questions might thus arise; but where there is really such evidence as distinctly shows the course of a party's whole life, if the principles be understood and kept in mind the inference must follow. There is scarcely a single case in which the rules applying to the whole subject have not, to a certain extent, been brought into discussion, and therefore, however we may sub-divide, and endeavour to classify and systematize the different branches, much will be found in each applying to the other, and it is only for the greater convenience of immediately turning to such points as especially apply to a particular branch that a classification is adopted. As the most important questions of domicile arise upon the residence in various countries, I have devoted more considerable space to that portion, but the general law will be more properly found under the consideration of what actually constitutes a domicile.

I must now refer to one or two modern cases too important to omit considering. In Hoskins v. Matthews, (20 Jur. 196; 26 L. T. 110, and 4 W. R. 216), Robert Matthews was born at Bath in 1778; became a captain in the Swedish service, and in 1810 returned to England, where he married an English lady, and remained in England until 1822, when he was appointed to the British Consulate in Spain, and resided at Cadiz. He was afterwards consul in Portugal, and returned to England in 1833, living upon a retiring pension of £500 a-year, to continue until he should be re-employed; which never happened, and he received his pension until his death. From 1833 until 1838, he lived in England; in 1834, 1836 and 1837, he made visits to the Continent for the education of his children, and for his own health; but he never had any house of his own in England, but lived in lodgings at Bath, and in London, and it appeared that he had once contemplated purchasing an estate in England. In 1836 he was attacked by a spinal disease, and in 1838, his wife died at Worthing, where he then was, but which place he then left and determined to go abroad to take the baths in Germany, where he travelled and went to Florence, stayed a month, and proceeded to Naples and Rome, returning to Florence in the Spring of 1839, living at hotels for a few weeks, and then purchased a villa called the Villa Lorenzi with the furniture, gardens, &c., for £2,800. A correspondence took place between Robert Matthews and his solicitor, which was in evidence, showing his attachment to England, in which this passage occurred, "he supposed that Mr. Turner had not found a house for him, or he would have mentioned it." Until the 30th of July, 1850, he resided at Florence, except three or four months, which he passed in England, and from 1846 till and exclusive of 1850, he annually visited the German baths. At different times he purchased and endeavoured to purchase land at Florence, and in the mountains of Tuscany for change of air, where he also obtained oil. His health, however, declined; and being attacked by paralysis, he went to England and consulted Sir Benjamin Brodie, who strongly advised his return to Florence. The letters written by him sometimes spoke of Florence as "his home," but on another occasion he said, "my mind is on a spring cable looking towards England." In August, 1843, he made a Tuscan will, and thereby disposed of his Tuscan property; and alluded to his being buried there. This instrument was executed according to the law of Tuscany; but on the 24th of July 1846, he made an English will not valid according to the law of Tuscany, whereby he disposed of property not in Tuscany for the benefit of his younger children, on condition that they did not interfere with his Tuscan will. His property consisted of £60,000 stock in the English funds, French Rentes, in the Dutch funds, and English railway shares; and having no real property except the Villa at Florence; he had three bankers in London, and deposited his papers and the English will with Mr. Turner in England.

The testator had eleven children, most of the sons and one daughter being educated in England, for which he seemed to entertain a great attachment, being a Protestant, and greatly disliking Roman Catholics. He had no business in Tuscany, and was never naturalized there, but had permission to reside paying the tax upon foreigners, and said he would return to England had his health permitted. Probate of both wills was granted by the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; and the question was whether the domicile of Matthews when he executed the two wills and at the time of his death was English or Tuscan? This case, it must be admitted, presents almost as great a complication of circumstances as can be imagined, and no doubt there was great difficulty in applying the well-known principles of the law of domicile to it, and after a very elaborate discussion and able arguments, Vice-Chancellor Wood thought that the testator had lost his English and acquired a Tuscan domicile. This decision being appealed from, Lord Justice Turner acquiesced in that opinion, and decided accordingly, and although Lord Justice Knight Bruce differed from him it had the effect of affirming the judgment of the court below. This difference of opinion in the case of such eminent judges not only shows the extreme difficulty raised by the circumstances and conduct of the party, but leaves it the more open to comment; and some observations made by Lord Justice Turner are worthy of special reference. His lordship said that it was a case which turned upon the animus of the party; and no doubt, the purchase of a Florentine villa and land in Tuscany were strong circumstances in favour of the acquirement of a Tuscan domicile, more particularly when such act was further confirmed and strengthened by the fact of residence; for there were both the animus and factum the two necessary ingredients to the acquirement of a new domicile. On the other hand, there was much to show that he had an hankering after his native country, and added to the circumstance of the extent and position of his property in England, it might be a question whether some act, showing a clear intention to abandon the Tuscan domicile would not have operated as a reverter of his English domicile of origin; but the thing favouring such a reverter was the coming to England for medical advice, and the attempt he had evidently been making through his confidential adviser Mr. Turner, to obtain a residence in England. There was, therefore, very much to support the decision come to; but when it is considered that so able a lawyer as Lord Justice Knight Bruce was of a contrary opinion, or rather did not concur in the opinion arrived at by his coadjutor, it naturally tends to a consideration of the conclusiveness of the result arrived at. As is usually the case where one judge of appeal (out of two) differs from the other, the dissentient seldom thinks it requisite to express reasons in detail for such non-concurrence, but in the case before us, two expressions used by the learned judge of appeal who did express his opinion might be grounds inter alia for such non-concurrence. The expressions I refer to are, that the case turned "upon the question of animus," and that the case was "not one of compulsory residence on account of ill-health." I shall not comment on these expressions, but leave them to the consideration of the learned reader; and refer him to the case of Johnstone v. Beattie, 10 Cl. & Fin. 42 & 139. In Bremer v. Bremer, (1 Deane Eccles. Rep. 192. General Calcraft, an officer in the East India Company's service, being resident in the West Indies in 1795, a daughter (the party in question) was born there. In 1805 she came to England in company with her mother and sister, her father subsequently coming to this country also, and they all resided together until 1825, when her mother dying, she left England and went to France with her governess, proceeded to Rome, and other parts of Italy, and it was said, that whilst in Italy she had married an Italian named Allegri; but this fact rested only upon the evidence of the party herself oral and written, which fixed the event as having taken place in 1830, but it was not communicated to her relations until 1840 or 1841, when her father was no more, he having died in 1835. In 1840, her sister, who at the death of her father had gone to reside with her in Paris, died, and she then went by the name of Allegri; her sister having denied that such marriage had ever taken place. She then resided in Paris for fifteen years in furnished lodgings in the Boulevard des Capucines, and elsewhere renewing from time to time the terms of three or six years for which she held those apartments, where she died in September 1853, having purchased a grave in the cemetery of Père La Chaise, in which her sister was buried, and where she wished her own remains to be deposited. The apartments in Paris were furnished with her own furniture, and she adopted the religion of the country, Roman Catholicism; but she never obtained letters of authorization from the French sovereign. With respect to the alleged marriage, it appeared that, upon being pressed by Mr. Freeman, her solicitor, with respect to the fact upon the transaction of some legal business, she was considerably agitated, and she admitted to him that she was not married; although in her will she described herself as "Fanny Allegri nee Calcraft," and executed the will in the same words. By this instrument she dealt with £300 per annum which she possessed in India, considerable property in England; and except some charitable legacies to institutions in Paris, the will which was made in English disposed of all this property in favour of English persons, and appointed English executors. Upon these facts the questions were in what country the deceased was domiciled when she made her will, and at the time of her death, and what the nature of her domicile, and the legal effect thereof was upon her testamentary acts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Sittings in Banco before Lord Chief Justice COCKBURN, and Justices CROMPTON and BLACKBURN.)

April 27.—Stephenson, app. v. Taylor, resp.—This was a case stated by Mr. G. O. Elliott, one of the police magistrates of the metropolis, for the opinion of this Court, as to whether volunteers in uniform, returning from drill, in a cab, were liable to pay toll at a turnpike-gate.
